Large Deficiencies.

Said Dr. Tupper in his speech at Amherst on Monday :-

He did not believe in trampling on a fallen foe. When his party had been beaten they had shown their opponents how a defeated party should carry themselves, and now when in power they would show them how a victorious party should act. But he felt it right to say that he believed the misfortune which befel this country in the overthrow of the Government of '72 was greater than had yet been realized: that it would be repaired in a day, and he must warn hu hearers, therefore, not to expect too much immediately. When his Government went out of power they banded over a full treasury -ten to tifteen millions of money to the hands of their successors. But now he was afraid to tell the country how they found the treasury on returning to it. If the press reporters were not here, ready to spread the fact before the country, he would tell them that instead of 10 to 15 millions in the treasury they found claims of 10 to 15 millions against it and not a dollar to meet them with! This was truly alarming, and he feared it would have a depressing influence on the public mind. The late Finance Minister had delayed his annual visit to England and allowed these claims to accumulate in order to avoid letting the truth be known until the elections were over.
