Now, sir, either Mr Jones must have been very unfortunate in the selection of his associates; or he must, as many tyros in science are apt to do, have generalized too hastily from a limited number of examples. I have lived in Believille within a few months of twenty (20) years, and have mixed and conversed freely with men of all ages and classes, and I affirm that the assertion in question is unbelieve, intentionally so) as regards the great body of our young (and old) men. there are in every community with which I have been conversant, who, having read a few books of so-called "popular science" in a very superficial manner, come out and boast that they "have freed themselves from the trammels of superstition; but they are neither numerous, nor distinguished for deep or extensive scientific knowledge or research, and they and their opinions are looked upon by the great body of their fellow citizens with compassionate disapprobation.
