WHY SMOKE

A common tobacco W HEN for the

The Pass of Brander.

A weary widow woman, With sweet soft English tongue; A stranger in the Highland glens, Feeble, and paie, and young.

And with her simple story. She passed from door to door: "O give me just a piece of bread And a night's rest once more.

"My husband was a sailor; He hailed from Oban Bay : want to take his baby home, And lay it where he lay.

"I'll lay it on his mother's bresst, And then I'll gladly go." And she held up a thin, thin hand, As white as any snow.

The wind sank, soft and still; The stars stood alently above Ben Cruschan's mighty hill.

Along the Pass of Brander

And, doubled in its tide,

The great black Pass of Brander Rose on the other side. An cerie place to travel through ; But she was not afraid

"I am too near God," she said. The path grew longer, longer -Such poor soft English feet ! But 'twas a brave young English heart,

Of ghost or wraith, of beast or man --

Patient, and calm, and sweet. At length her steps grew heavy as lead; The baby woke and cried; She stopped and fed it at her breast,

Then strange, strange thoughts came into her head; She saw her cottage door;

She heard sweet English bells chime faint

Across the Highland moor. Deep sleep was stealing o'er her lids, A soft sleep without pain: She rose and clutched her baby tight, And tried to walk again.

But vain the struggle, vain the toil; "It is too late!" she cried. And from Ben Cruachan's lefty top She saw white angels glide.

'They'll robe me, without any lack,

In shining robes all new." So one by one, to wrap the boy, Her garments off she drew. Warm sheltered, like young birds in nest She placed him by a stone,

Saying, "The angels watch thee, child, Until this night be gone !" Weeping-"If I should save thee, child, No man will show me score." Then lay down, white on the white snow,

As bare as babe new bern. It is a brave young sailor: He hails from Oban Bay : His granddame's pride, his ship mates boast,

Se handsome, bold and gay. But his cheek will pale of a sudden, And tears gush like a tide,

If you name the Pass of Brander, Where his English mother died. Nors. - This anecdote, which I have only localized, was told me as a fact by the late Dr. Norman Macleod. He had once referred to it in a sermon (preached, I believe, in Liverpool.) After service a sailor came up and spoke to him: "Sir," with a burst of tears, "that story of yours was true. The woman was my mother." Correspondence.
