It is evident that the one the German Premier is communicating with can use his own language if he prefers it and has pluck enough. If the French language is to be abandoned in diplomatic intercourse and any other substituted, the English language has claims possessed by no other. But courtesy would require that one Covernment in addressing another should use the language of the Government addressed.

The clergy of the City of Canterbury have proved at once their good sense, and their sterling reverence by a resolution they lately adopted at the residence of the Bishop of Dover. It may appear to some a small matter that they should have agreed henceforward to refuse scarves and hatbands at funerals; but we cannot doubt that behind this comparatively trivial self-denying ordinance there lurks a wish to intimate to their flocks that excessive ceremonial is distasteful and out o place at the brink of the grave.

In a suit brought against a life insurance company in St. Louis to recover $10,000 insurance, which was tried last week, one of the grounds of defence was that the insured had been, addicted to drunkenness, while he had stated to the company's examiner that he was sober and temperate in his habits, and had always been so. The question of what constitutes a drunkard having thus been raised. Mr Francis Carvey, an attorney, was put on the to this point.
