Setting then religion aside about trades' unions, about the nine-hours' is plain that, upon principles of reason movement, or any "exed question of the day between capital and labour, will be disappointed no doubt. Mr Brown could have given us much valuable information at first hand on these subjects, for he tells us that "much of the work was prepared during the intermissions of manual toil." But his little book has a more ambitious aim ; its design is to discover the first and final cause of all the evils under which labour is supposed to suffer. This Mr Brown believes he has discovered in the existence of a paper currency and lending at interest. Such a position naturally involves a
