they pleased, but that he would put the motion in as it was. He argued that it was utterly impossible that one individual could assess the city as it should be according to law, and within a given time. A man might be found to have the ability and talent necessary to do the work, but he was not the one nominated by Ald. Gaskin. He was not favourable to any one who was named as an applicant; he was opposed to the whole of them. The Council had the power to appoint one Assessor, but if so there would be Assessors appointed by him to assist who would be independent of the Council. The selection of but one assessor would be a grand mistake, which they would remember and regret in after years.
