Spanish Onions,

We have much perhaps to try us; And we thirst for deeper lore, For of wisdom's latest learning Lemons, We all can't have much in store, Since our libraries are scanty. And our people don't take heed-But it matters not a farthing, For we have no time to read.

We have wives and weans to care for, Who may live when we are dead, And what poverty may haunt their When without their natural head But aye put trust in Providence All good Christian people say,-And of course we have occasion For its exercise alway,

THE CANADIAN CLERGY SONG.

Hurrah, we sing for Canada.

The land of the brave and the free.

The land of the pine and the hemlock,
And the sugar maple tree,—
The land where bear and beaver

And the work to which we're called;

Or go wabilling in the snow.

Hurrab, for the life of freedom

We go marching on forever

And shall never be appall'd;

If our stipend be but little,

We enjoy it when it comes,

And are kept in expectation Of something tween our thumbs:

And go tretting here and there,

But when we're kept so basy, boys,

We are saved from ennui blues.

True, we've much of visitation.

And of preaching and orations,

We may have a lion's share:

And old Satan cannot tempt us

Standing idle in our shoes.

Then hurrah for all our chances And the work to which we're called We'il go marching on forever And shall never be appail d: There's a joy in all our labors E'en a pleasure in our fears, And we'll triumph through another Who shall wipe away our tears.

Helen, I have some to-night to say

THE LAST TRYST.

Cyril Raynor's voice sounded cold and clear; but his companion glanced up into his pale face, she saw pain there, even the dim light. 'I have often spoken to you, Helen about fighting my own way in the world and now- the time has come.' Down into the long grass sank Heler Verne; and with her face buried in her

'Will you not wish me good fortune, my darling, and tell me that you will try to be patient? asked Cyril, cheerfully, as her head rested upon his shoulder. 'Cyril, you know every longing of my heart will be for you success and safe re turn home. But when shall I see you again? Say soon, Cyril, very soon; you know how lonely I shall be. 'One year from to-night, at this hour, and in this place, I will meet you, God willing,' was the firm answer.

'May the holy angels guard you, Helen, my beloved, and may heaven enable us oth to meet soon!' were Cyril Raynor's arting words. low slowly the days were on, and how of anxiety they were to Helen died away, and the eve of meeting came again. When the autumn moon rose high never gripe, nor sicken. in the heavens, Helen again hastened down the narrow foot path to meet him from whom she had parted one year ago. 'Cyril, are you here! Speak if you here She took a step forward into the darkness, and her foot struck some soft object in the grass. Her heart gave one mighty leap, and then its throbbing came quick and fast. Helen Verne was no coward and the next instant she was kneeling on the ground; with her hand passing over the clothing of a prostrate man. Presently her hand came in contract with a cold, damp face. She almost shricked aloud. The head frightfully crushed under her hand, and she knew that something fearful had happened to the senseless form lying in the darkness. Oh, if there was only moonlight. As she sat there in silence, a zudden thought darted into her mind. Her hand passed once more over the body, and at last touched the dead hand. She took it in both of hers, and after a quick search she felt a strangely-wrought ring on the little fingor. Then the old woods echoed again and again with her heartbreaking cries, as though wrang from woman in direct teremity. It was Cyril Raynor's dead hand she held, and his body lay heside her. Her cries aroused her father; and after much searching they found her lying prostrate beside the murdered Cyril, totally unconscious. Both were conveyed to the house; and long did the heartbroken girl live in that alarming state. When she did recover from it, her lips endeavored to frame some words, but none would come. With a passionate gesture and a few slight struggles, Helen Verne was dead. Long, long after Cyril and Helen were hands, she wailed out. 'Oh I might have laid side by side in quiet rest, the truth came out. When on her death bed, the wretched Mrs. Verne made her fearful confession and disclosed the perpetrator of the murder, and confessed that she had ordered it to be done. She had done it to keep Cyril Raynor from gaining Helen's fortune she said; and then she died in the gratest agony.
