It has been patent to every one that neither the Council nor the public would tolerate a continuance of last year's management of the streets. Alderman Allen, throughout his thirty years of service in the Council, has maintained a credit for freedom from personal motives, but the frequency of his delays and the obstinacy of his course in several respects last year, and chiefly his system of central autocracy in place of ward control, produced a dissatisfaction that is alone responsible for his release from the chief control. At a caucus held in Alderman Drennan's, before the new Conneil took office, the scheme of returning the old directorate once more to power was disclosed, and from that evening the much-inflated "secession" grew. And matter what may be the private grievances and duplicities which gentlemen within the dominant civic party complain of, the public must rejoice over the success of the movement, because it has dently wished for.
