THE GREAT HOTEL The shades of night are falling fast.

As to the clerk my traps I passed.

My name was booked, and in a trice

This well-dressed youth called, once or twice.

My heart was sad, my eyes grew dim, As I surveyed the style of him, Like silver plated clariou rung That number from his ready tongue— In lower rooms I saw the light

Of happy guests gleam war and bright; Above, the spectral stairway shone, And from my lips escaped a groun; Try not the stairs, a well boy said The rooms are small, up overhead They grumble sore who there abide -And sadly still my voice replied,

O, stay, the maiden said, and—well, What else she said I shall not tell; A tear stood in my cold glass eve.

As, pointing up, I made reply

X-seil-sec-her-927 Beware the roof and scuttle door. Be-where you ve never been before-

This was the porter's last good night, My voice replied far up the height, At break of day, as heavenward The tramp of chambermaids was heard, Upclimbing, wondering who was there, A voice sighed on the morning air, There, in the morning, cold and high

And ne'er had been so near to Heaven As when he reached Nine twenty seven.
