FRIDAY EVENING, SEPTEMBER IN THE MINES, 1870

The night wind whistled through the pines And mounted down in the gorge, hare lightnings flashed deep in the mines Lake bolts from Vulcan's forge.

Aha," a sturdy miner cried. Grim death is at the door. storm comes down the mountain side And dark's the distant shore." And on the maddened waves

Are tossing to and fro; Bedecked with foam the water laves As white as driven snow, And we, a careless few, defy The angry tempest's might. Hark ! Listen to the sea gulls cry

That pierces through the night.

The sea birds shrieked along the blue

As the ; th 'twere night of doom. And storm clouds hurried swiftly through To shade the deepening gloom. The miners gathered in the tent Around the 'ampe' dull light:

The storm rolled down the mountain s side And howled along the shore; Was heard the torrent's roar

Each gr mly face a wildness lent

To wilder, deeper night.

And flickering lamplight failed In darkne s deep each miner grim The awful storm bewailed. Then loud above the piercing storm A prayer for ais was beard. God !" "Help !" But scarce each shrinking

Could murmur out the word be night grew into day Revealing rain, death. And scattered round the miners lay

And in the hill side mold was made For a long and shallow grave, For u en whom neither human aid. Nor human prayers could save.

It was about twenty minutes after the steamer had backed out from the dock and headed on her course. He went all, finding it difficult to go through the smoke, but groping his way ift to the after cabin stairs, he proceeded to the hurricane deck at the stern. The crew were throwing water with pails about the smoke stack. The woodwork was all abiaze, the flames shoeting up almost to. the top of the smoke stack. The water had no effect. Mr. Eing piesed up the hose, but the fire at that time had sout off the engine and it was useless. The crew still labored drawing up water with robes a tached to pairs. It being observed that the flames increased, Mr. King urged the crew to launch the boats. there were no passengers at the after hurricane deck that Mr. King could see. Two of the boats were launched -con a life boat and the other a yau! They were immediately filled with passengers, who stood upon the guards and lower decks An effort was made by Ar.
