and nothing but a sense of duty would make him do so. Sunday schools were doing a great work throughout the world and the time is past when they required to be defended. It is admitted that they are among the foremost agencies of the day in influencing society for good. John Bright had said that he believed that Sunday school teachers had done more for the benefit of the nation than all their statesmen put together. Ecclesiastically, nationally and as auxiliaries to the great work of Christian missions, these institutions had accomplished much. The speaker enumerated numerous instances of the results of the efforts of children in England in connection with the missionary enterprise. The great object of teaching should be the conversion of the children.
