The opposition candidate in the Essex election has entered a protest against the legality of the candidature and actual return of the Ministerial nominee,o the ground that he is disqualified by the Election Act to take a seat in Parliament. We understand that a similar THRESHING MACHINES.—The owners Dundee, for Rangoon, was wrecked in the protest has been entered in the Addington case, though this form of procedure seems in any case to be useless, as we have yet to learn that Returning officer is empowered to decide the eligibility or non-eligibility of candidates-that duty being, it is fair to assume, confined to the Election Court judges. It is true that certain sections of the Elections Act may be construed so as to favour the contention that disqualification follows after a voidance of an election for corrupt practices by agents, as no Act of Parliament was ever written that could not be twisted inte ambiguity; but the best answer to this construction of the law is that the judges have refused to disqualify, on The first Masonic funeral in California any but the most conclusive evidence, a candidate for re-election for personal briber. Now, if bribery by agents were sufficient to work such disqualification, why should the greatest hesitancy be shown to affix the charge of personal bribery to a candidate, when he was already disqualified by the conduct of his agents And why do petitioners' counsel endeavour to press home the personal charges in order to prevent the respondent running again, if they hold that the Act has already disqualified him for bribery by his agents ? This view of the matter is more conclusive than any ingenious twistings of the wording of the Act to fav-
