In the first session-of the Reform Government, the Legislature, under the advice of the Government, resumed the exercise of its privilege and obvious duty in determining the appropriation of the public moneys to railways. Increased rovision was at the same time made for the encouragement of railway enterprises; dual representation was abolished; Government officials paid by fees were disalitied as members of the Assembly; lower was given to committees of the puse to administer oaths to witnesses; changes were made in the law respecting the drainage of wet lands, rendering the charges for drainage operations less onerous, and providing for the work being better done, than under the provisions o revious legislation; just protection was afforded in respect of the property and errnings of married women; and other usoful and beneficial laws were enacted.
