A teacher stood in the midst of her class, surrounded by eager faces. As each bright little lad and wee, small lass looked up from their wonted places, and she told in accents loving and sweet (Though now no name proclaiming) Of that Character rare in whom there meet All virtues of heavenly naming. She told of his gentleness, love, and truth, Of his patience which wearied never; She told how he blessed each maiden and youth, And brightened their pathways forever. She told how the little ones came at his call, And answered his smile so tender; How he scorned all wrong, though in palace hall, And of weak ones became the Defender. "And now, do you know of whom I speak?" I asked from one to another. "O yes!" cried one, "I know very well. You are talking about my mother."

And happy for you, and for me mine, If in each day of our living We come so near to that heavenly vine. That its grace we are ever receiving.
