HE WAS VERY MEEK.

And Jones, to His Sorrow, Discovered the Reason Therefor.

He was a big enough man, but he looked so meek that he seemed rather undersized. And he was meek. Ladies getting on a street car recognized him at once as a henpecked man and east a disdainful glance on him by way of thanks for the seat he always gave up with an apologetic air as-if he had been guilty of a misdemeanor in sitting in it in the first place. Men flecked their cigar ashes on him and turned to apologize, but seeing his meekness concluded not to take the slammed down in front of him the leathket people gave him fruit that would rot before he got it home. In fact, he got the worst of it everywhere, but he never complained and let humanity trample on his corns with patient forbearance.

Jones in particular seemed to have it in for the meek man, whom he in derision called "Fighting Mollie," and the ingenuity of Jones in devising indignities for his spiritless victim was worthy of a better cause. Jones was a large, florid faced man who had no mercy and was insolent just for fun. But Jones made a mistake one day in the park. He stepped up to the meek man, pounded him on the back, smashed his hat down over his eyes and

It was thought by the military that they had him and his band surrounded in a forest, but a few days ago he mysteriously vanished, and vesterday a manifesto signed Moni was discovered nailed to church door near Sassari, in which the brigand chief declared war upon his enemies the gendarmes, police, military, and others.

When king Humbert visited Sardinia recently, Moni addressed a letter to his majesty, asking for safe conduct and an audience.
