THE CITY OF THE FUTURE.

WHAT KINGSTON MIGHT BE TWENTY YEARS HENCE.

An Ex-aldorman's Strange Dream—Great Possibilities for the Old Limestone City—What the City might be in the Future is what the city should be now.

"I had a remarkable dream a night or two ago," remarked an ex-aldorman in a contemplative manner to a group of "old cronies" who gathered last evening the same as usual to exchange gossip and talk of politics over their evening smoke.

"Well, let's have it. It's worth hearing," came the request in chorus. "Mine was hardly a case of Billy 'Looking Backward,' it was more of a looking forward to possibilities. Well, to begin, I found myself aboard a train speeding from New York back to Kingston about an evening of twenty years. When I had been in the train for some time, but I realized that I was leaving New York for Kingston and that I had been away from my native city for a score of years. The trip from New York to Kingston consumed five hours and there was not any transfer between the two points; a bridge connected the main land with the Wolfe Island shore on her side and the train crossed direct between the metropolis of the empire state and the capital of Frontenac.

"I was not prepared for the great change I found in the old limestone city, expecting to see in the same old city place, but I soon learned that another generation of the Edger family had grown up and were possessed of even more business enterprise than their forefathers. Not only had they put new life into the place, but they had induced outside capital, mostly American, to invest here and the result was seen in the numerous monuments of capital—tall chimneys belching forth smoke, betokening bustling activity. I soon learned that those many factories employed thousands of workmen whose comfortable homes extended all the way out to where the village of Cataract and Portsmouth used to be, and northward even beyond the old Grand Trunk depot.

"I wondered what had become of the big unsightly grain elevators which obtruded the harbor view in past years, and upon enquiry found that they had long since been razed to the ground. No further use for them; grain was loaded at Frontenac, Port William and other upper lake ports in huge whaleback steamers which made a continuous voyage and unloading their cargoes at Liverpool and other ports in England. I found many of these boats tied up along the harbor front, loading the products turned out of the many mills and factories located on the lake shore and at other points around the city. Cataract bridge has disappeared and in its stead had built the island, which now formed part of the main land, a small iron bridge connecting its easterly limit with the Pittsburg shore. Not a trace of the old Grand Trunk depot could I find; in its place rolling mills occupying the site and being supplied with ore from the fine deposits along the line of the K. & P. railway, which had been double-tracked to meet the demands of the increasing traffic.

"I was greatly pleased with the general appearance of things everywhere in evidence. Fine granolithic pavements on the old boardwalks, and all the streets were paved with a new process of asphalt. All the cabs were rubber-tired, and it was difficult to make a horse that was not shod with rubber. What astonished me most of all was the entire absence from the streets of unsightly wooden poles, so familiar to me twenty years ago. All the telephone, electric and trolley wires were underground, and I was informed that gas, steam for heating of dwellings and water were conveyed through the city in glass pipes. Woolen sweaters, had entirely disappeared, and the modern houses were of pressed brick or heavy limestone. The streets laid out in the newer portion of the city were not less than 100 feet wide, and where the old Cataract driving park used to be, now existed a beautiful park, almost in the very heart of the city. Electric cars traversed nearly all the streets, and a ride to any part of the city cost only one cent, the low rate being due to the fact that the system was owned and maintained by the municipality, which also controlled the electric lighting and plant for supplying the inhabitants with steam. I found that mostly all the dwelling and stores were heated by electricity at a very low cost. Bath was also employed for domestic use, so that the old time cooking stoves had almost entirely disappeared, near little appliances using steam and electricity taking their place.

"Upon enquiring what had become of the market, and if farmers did not follow the old custom of congregating together on certain days and selling their produce in one place, I was told that there was not any such spot in the city as a market place. Farmers dealt direct with immense commission houses, which in turn supplied all retail dealers. Nearly all the butter used was imported from New Zealand, that country developing that industry while the farmers of Canada had so advanced in the art of cheese making as to rival the world and defy competition. Hence very little butter was made in this country, while New Zealand, realizing that it could not compete with Canada in the cheese market, had developed butter making to a remarkable degree of perfection.

"The old market place which I remembered so well no longer existed. The entire area was occupied by a magnificent pile of municipal buildings of modern architectural splendor. I learned that the architect who planned the buildings had conferred upon him the dignity of the legion of honor; no doubt he would have been knighted had monarchy continued its sovereignty of Great Britain. Of mayor and council the city had none; a municipal affairs hierarchy consisted by the body termed the 'city council' were now carried on by five commissioners elected by all the people, the ward system having long since been discarded. The president of the board was determined by the vote of the people, the man getting the largest vote taking that honor and occupying the position formerly held by the mayor. These five commissioners were paid remunerative salaries and devoted all their time to the city's affairs and were elected for a term of three years. No man could qualify for commissioner unless he possessed, clear of encumbrances, real estate to the value of $10,000. Assessments was levied against land values only, and against dwellings which might occupy the land. Rich and poor were thus treated alike and this system resulted in compelling extensive land owners to sell off their unused possessions, which enabled the middle and working classes to purchase at a reasonable sum sufficient real estate on which to erect comfortable dwellings for themselves.

"Naturally the educational system kept pace with the times, and there had just come into force a new order of things, whereby education was as free as the air. A child entered the kindergarten class at THE MARKET'S FATE. Will Not Be Held At All Unless There is a Change. "Speaking of market tolls," said a member of the city council yesterday, "I think the council was justified in lowering them to the present standard, even though the statutes did not force the measure. I would like to see the tolls wiped out altogether, providing the city could stand the loss of revenue. It is a matter of general knowledge that our market is not as well attended now as in former years, even though the tolls are lower. There are only about three weeks in the year when there is a good attendance, and then it is Christmas and Easter, and that brings in the farmers.

"The corner grocers in outlying districts are killing the market for one thing, farmers loading directly with these merchants. Another thing that accounts for the small attendance is the fact that the farmers make less butter now than heretofore. Years ago farmers who kept ten cows and made up butter for the market, now keep fifty or more and send the milk to the cheese factories. Not having butter to deliver they are not obliged to come to the city so often, because much of the land heretofore given over to the raising of produce is now converted into pastures.

"Look at our market attendance any one of the three days in the week! How many actual farmers do you find there! The majority of the rigs you will find belong to market gardeners and butchers. I think the council ought to adopt every reasonable measure to induce farmers to attend market, so as to get them away from the growing practice of dealing direct with grocers instead of the consumers."
