That Ever Played.

At that time he was, I suppose, about 22 or 23 and the handsomest man I ever saw. Alas, how he changed! Mr. Forrest was never a good tempered man and was apt to be morose and churlish at rehearsals. But he had many noble qualities. He was the "fairest" actor that ever played. If the character you sustained had anything good in it, he would give you the finest chance of tirely to you. This will be better understood by actors, who know how differently some players act. He was not without appreciation of a little "joke" either. On one occasion, at the old Park theater, we were playing as an afterpiece "Therese, the Orphan of Geneva. He, as Carwin, rushes with a drawn dagger into the pavilion where he believes that Therese is sleeping. Immemet face to face in the apartment of finished screaming for her life. I was horror stricken at my error. "Oh, horrors, Mr. Forrest, what shall I do?" He smiled the beautiful smile which illuminated his face and said, "Never mind; I'll go out by the back door!"-From Autobiographical Sketches of Mrs. John Drew in Scribner's.

The Piane Plague.

Any one that wonders how it is that all the piano makers in the world can manage to make a living can find an answer in the statistics which some laborious person has gathered concerning the "piano plague" of England. In the United Kingdom are 45,000,000 persons, living in 7,000,000 houses, and there is in that unhappy realm one piano for every seven houses. The average cost of a piano is $100, so that there are invested in these instruments $100,000,000. The average life of a piano is ten years, therefore must English, Irish, Scotch and Welsh pay out $10,000,000 a year to keep them this kind of music. But this is not the worst. Supposing that every piano is "played at" two hours a day, 2,000,-000 hours are given to it in the two islands every day, and if the statistician is correct in saying that out of the million Great quantities of raisirs, figs. of planists but 100 really knew how to lo- play the instrument well, imagine the result.-London Letter.
