NOT IN A DANGEROUS POSITION. Standard Oil Company's steel Barge Easily

Beleased. At the request of the New York manager of the Standard oil company the Donnelly salvage and wrecking company sent representatives down to examine the steel tank barge ashore on Hog island. Cedar rapids. Capt. Donnelly, sr., and John Donnelly, jr, returned home to day, having found that the barge is in such a position that the tug Rival can pull it off. The steel barge in going down the rapide swung out of the channel and drifted against the island. It has not grounded, but is merely kept against the shore by the force of the current. Yesterday the crew ran an anchor out a short distance to try and pull the s.ern around so the current would strike the boat on the starboard side and weep it off the shore. The anchor, however, would not hold and the scheme had to be abandoned. The tug Rival lay some distance below to pick the barge up if it had left the bank. That plan failing the Rival continued down the rapids to enter the Beauharnois canal and reach the head of the series of rapide. She intended to run the rapide, round to near the barge, and pass a line to those on board. A short pull would turn the barge from the shore. It is possible that that plan will succeed. Hog island lies about eight miles below Coteau Landing.

THEY FOUGHT NAKED.

How McCalla's Marines Rushed Out of the Sea and Into Battle. Clothed chiefly in cartridge belts Mo-Calla's gallant marines charged the Spanish at Guantanamo landing. Not since the time, as veraciously described by Rudyard Kipling, when Private Mulyiney and the three year men swam the Irawadi and "tuk Lungtungpen naked" has there been such a combat.

It was shortly after the marines had been first landed. Though there have been reports that the Spanish had over 8,000 men in and about Guantanamo, the Americas hardly feared an attack. Still guards were posted in two lines outside the camp and a sharp watch

That night the Marblehead swept the hillside with its searchlight, but no trace of a foe was discovered. The men got to laughing at each other for seeing spooks, and the impression grew that the sounds in the brush were made by animals. So things passed until Saturday afternoon. Suddenly a breathless Cuban was bling with excitement and told a lively "The Spaniards! The Spaniards!" he repeated. "Two hundred of them are in the woods. They are going to shoot!

camp itself settled down to an incredulous wait for what Mahoney, Neville and the rest who had been sent out scouting would make out of the Cuban's alarm, when "pack, pack, pack!" the sharp spatter of modern rifles came from the dense tropical brush near the head of the lagoon. It was the enemy firing on Sergeant Smith's guard.

sound as Smith's men replied, drawing in for orders as they fired. Nevillo's men could be seen running in the direction of the firing, going up in a series of rushes, shooting by volleys as they went. Mahoney's squad on the double quick made for a hillock commanding the barranca.

Up from the sea came running a line of naked men, grabbing their carbines and falling into place as Colonel Huntington issued his orders, getting a formation in semicircle behind the brow of the hill and waiting to see how much force would develop against him.

A few Spaniards had been seen near the head of the lagoon when the first shots were fired, but the scattering rifle cracks did not indicate any concentrated body of men. Huntington moved his line up, ordered the men to kneel and then gave the command to fire.

The American guns talked as if the men were at practice drill on some home parade ground. There was no ragged firing without orders, and the naked men were as rendy as the rest.

But there was no definite mark to shoot at. After the first showing at long range not a Spaniard was seen, and the men banged away at waving bushes or where sounds seemed to indicate a moving body. Apparently the Spaniards made a theatrical sort of showing and ran just as soon as Sergeant Smith's guards began to fire, Smith thinks his men bagged an enemy or two, but no Spaniards were found in the bush.

Half an hour afterward Colonel Hunt ington reformed his men on the crest of the hill, having beaten up the bush for a mile around. Roll call showed every man present, and not a wound was reported. Then the men put on their uniforms.
