GERALDINE'S LETTER.

"Black Rock," a tale of the Selkirks, by Ralph Connor, has been placed before the public by the Westminster Co., Ltd., London, England. The book is prettily bound in pale green linen and is printed in large clear type, on strong heavy paper. Readers of The Westminster have learned to look with pleasure for Ralph Connor's stories which have appeared from time to time in that magazine, and this new publication will be hailed with delight by the admirers of that clever Canadian writer, many of whom class him with Ian MacLaren. "Black Rock" is a story of life among the miners and lumbermen in the heart of the Selkirks. Each chapter is complete in itself, and yet each is connected with the others, so that, while it is in a sense a continuous story, it is also a closely-knit one, and, making a strong chain of love, humor, self-sacrifice and duty. Perhaps an impartial critic might be pardoned for saying that everything turns out too well to be true to life. The influence of the Presbyterian minister, of the courteous little French Canadian priest, and of the beautiful young widow, Mrs. Maynor, who is adored by all the settlers, may appear to wield too powerful a sway over those hearty impulsive characters, but the book appeals so strongly to the emotions that the reader does not stop to question while the story is progressing. After we have read it and thought it over, we may wonder whether such a man like Mr. Craig we have ever met. And would Mrs. Maynor—in real life—have gone back to live with her mother-in-law when she loved, wanted her to share his work in the western home? Both are better for having lived up to their high ideals of duty, but it all turns out beautifully that there is nothing left to the imagination. All the mothers are so smoothly polished and rounded off, that the inference is, they lived happily ever afterwards.
