One company, he said, painted its poles a very suggestive color, which is anything but tasteful or pleasant to look at. The telephone company paints its poles a pale blue and red, sticking a warning notice in white on each pole. These colorings destroy the beauty of the streets, and detract from the otherwise harmonious surroundings. Some control, he said, should be exercised over these companies in the matter of painting their poles, so as to have them colored in harmonious hues. He pointed out that it is just as cheap to use nice colors as disagreeable shades.
