Relatives of a Boston Woman Search For

Her Wealth. BOSTON, Oct. 13.—Relatives of Mrs. Almira M. Perham, a woman of some eccentricities, who died here recently, persistent finally rewarded by finding $64,000 in cash and accurities, part of which was hidden in a bustle.

This article of dress was found in a closet, and, although at first thrown aside after a hasty inspection, was again searched and $24,000 found secreted in the wire

A further search of trunks and household articles brought to light bonds and bank books showing $40,000 more.

Mrs. Perham had lived in humble quarters and was considered in poor circumstances by her neighbors. Her wealth will be divided between sixteen relatives.

SOME OF THE WAYS LUDWIG HAD OF AMUSING HIMSELF.

Expensive Opera at Baircuth-Brilliant Turnouts Used at Night ln the Forests. Driving Horses Crazy That He Might Be

If Ludwig II, the young king of Bavaria, was mad, it was from excess of majesty. The monarch of one of the smallest kingdoms of the world, his opinion of himself was magnificent beyond all dreams Architecture and building were his ruling Supporters of Granites football teams hobbies, and he was thus able to gratify the one delusion by building magnificent edifices, the second by occupying his time in the most extraordinary fashions and the third by shunning society and escaping the inspection of ordinary eyes, either in his gorgeous retreats or by retiring to one of the more humble dwellings he erected on various mountain summits, where a few attendants awaited his unexpected visits. Ludwig's mania for solitude took the most unexpected twists. He enjoyed this own company best on those occasions when people whose minds are less phenomenally balanced consider companionship most essential. It was his fancy to have dramatic and musical performances for himself alone. Unfortunate theatrical managers and indignant musical directors, not daring to resist the royal whim, were driven to waste their talent by providing entertainments. The theater was darkened, the orchestra, the chorus and the full dramatic company were grudgingly provided, one and all detesting the work of the solitary figure sitting silent and motionless in the shadow of the royal box. Music Ludwig loved, and many of his wildest extravagances and maddest acts of prodigality were due to the influence of Wagner, his one friend and adviser. It was Wagner who prompted his most transcendent folly, the erection of a hage theater at Bairouth for that composer's

The front of one was formed by a gigantic shell borne wreaths to the royal occupant. The ornamentation of another was so profuse that but three small spaces were left on the sleighs were never drawn by fewer than four borses. He appears to have been fond of these animals, which he called his "dumb courtiers." But, like everything else about him, they were compelled to suffer in order to gratify their master's glorification. One performance alone en-

£15,000 was paid by the king, the rest be-

During the winter of 1874 instructions were sent to the royal stables that the 30 best horses they contained were for several days to be fed on nothing but oats. The grooms imagined they were to be entered for a race. Though a blinding snowstorm was raging, Ludwig commanded some workmen to at once set about erecting wooden tower in the forest adjoining his palace, and around this tower a gallery was to run. Finally when his plans were matured he stationed an orchestra of wind instruments near this erection, taking up his own position on the balcony. In the cornfields near he had scattered here and there drnms, kettles and some soldiers with rifles loaded with powder, and an, order was given that each man should remain hidden and silent. At a given signal the horses were led quietly to the foot of the tower. Then the king gave a sign which was understood by the leader of the orchestra, by the drums, kettles, trumpets and soldiers. In an instant the most infernal hubbub broke forth. Each drummer vied with the other to beat louder, the trumpeters nearly burst their cheeks, there were powder explosions, shrill whistles and most diabolical howls. The terrifled horses broke their fastenings. Mad with terror, they reared, wheeled, zigzagged; plunging and kicking, they galloped here and there; with blood red postrils and floating manes penetrated the woods or become engulfed in the marshes. His majesty, however, was well amused. The tricks Ludwig played on his horse
