A SEASON OF ANXIETY. There is something distracting about days. The liberals had no difficulty in se-Lount's retirement they cast about them for a suitable person to take his seat, and found this one in Mr. Bertram, who is one of the most progressive men in Toronto, and a citizen, who, apart from politics, any constituency would be honored in electing him. The conservatives have not been so fortunate. For a week they peddled the nomination about Centre Toronto, and offered it to adozen of personsin the order of merit, we presume and rank in public estimation. Several times they thought they had a hen on, and that she would hatch out something sure, but they were disappointed. Alderman Scott, formerly of Kingston, was one of the last to take the thing into his consideration, and dream over it for a day, only to decide eventually that he could not accept it. Then there was a long and wearisome session of the party's braves. They sat late into the night, and talked themselves tired. It was a case of do or die, and a great relief was felt at the end when O. H. Howland, the member in the local legislature for South Toronto, the altar of his party. He was the requests of the conservatives at the feet of many others. He had used his classic tongue in presenting the glories of the contest and the success that was sure to follow a contest in which he had a hand. He was so sure that the conservative candidate would win that when others failed the committee, refusing to be influenced by the young man's palaver, and the nomination was hurled at himself, he could not refuse it. A few considerations follow.

First. Mr. Howland is lauded as a man the prosperity of the people, to which he contributes, in place of their misfortunes.
