The Sage to the Young Man.

"Old man, say, has length of years Plongh'd those furrows on thy brow. And washed thy bair as white as snow. And dried the fountain of thy tears ?"

"No, stranger, no, my bleached hair Was not made so by age alone; But care on disappointment's stone Whett'd his knife and carv'd his share.

Oh, young man, know the greatest boom Found within life's narrow span, Yet most of all abused by man, In health-of all earth's joy the crows.

Give not thy passions lengthened rein, But curb them ere they lawless grow, Lest they make life's cup o'erflow With poignant grief and deathless pain,

For know, incendiary sin Will kindle in thy breast a flame, And blast the flow'rs adown life's lase, And every beauty found within :

And should life run to sheerless age, Around reflection's neck 'twill hang A millstone weight of guilt and pang, And write 'Despair' on life's last page.

Let Wisdom cast a minute bell, And hang it in thy bosom's tow'r. To warn thee of each fleet-wing'd hour, And life's uncertainty to tell.

Write 'Honor' on thy youthful brow, And let its lamp thy footsteps guide; So shall life's stream more smoothly glide, And rarest flow'rs around the grow.

Give rotten friendship to the wind; A stinking carcass let it be, "Twill smile at thy adversity; Show it, then, thou art not blind.

And turn on backbiters thy back, Beneath their tongue a viper lurks, Whose poison kills thy name, or burts, And gives thy peace unto the rack.

Farewell, young man; write what will stand His Searching Eye whee stars shall fall, And secrets all are known to all, And wrath bares its uplifted hand.

Yea, ask his aid whose word alone Can worlds create or change the heart; The needful strength He will impart, And draw thee to His heavenly home."
