The manner of the man as a member of Parliament, whether in opposition or in power, is simple and unaffected. There is no posing for effect with him; he never speaks to the galleries, although he often speaks to the country through the channel of Parliament. When the bell sounds at 3 o'clock in the afternoon calling in the members, Sir Richard is usually in his place to hear the Speaker's prayers. His dress is invariably a black frock coat, usually buttoned across his broad chest, and his black soft hat which he wears as a rule when in his seat. WOULD FIGHT 201 DUELS.

Pick of French Swordsmen. Signor Greco, champion swordsman Italy, has issued challenges to 201 combat. He is in deadly earnest. He is willing to fight these 201 men, one after another, until he has killed them all or is killed himself. Those who know Greco say that nothing would give him more satisfaction than to shed the blood of innumerable Frenchmen. He would not draw the line at 201, if it came to that point. He is a man who knows neither fear

Jules Ferry, and that Boulanger was wounded. In this country an elderly politician would scarcely be able to encounter an active army officer with swords. Some of the French newspapers keep duelling editors. Italy is also a nation of fencers, and between the styles of the two countries there are marked differences. These
