A DAINTY WAIST.

A Useful Adjunct to the Winter Toilette. Navy blue is to be one of the favorite colors for the cold season, just as it has for ages past, and is likely to be for many more. It drops into disuse every little while until some even-minded woman, who knows its worth, comes out in a stunning new rig of it, and starts the world of fashion anew after gowns o

It is such a ready color to combine with others, and may be as dressy or as plain as one wishes. All summer seashore gowns of navy blue and white figured silks were worn, and so, gradually the shade has crept into the affections

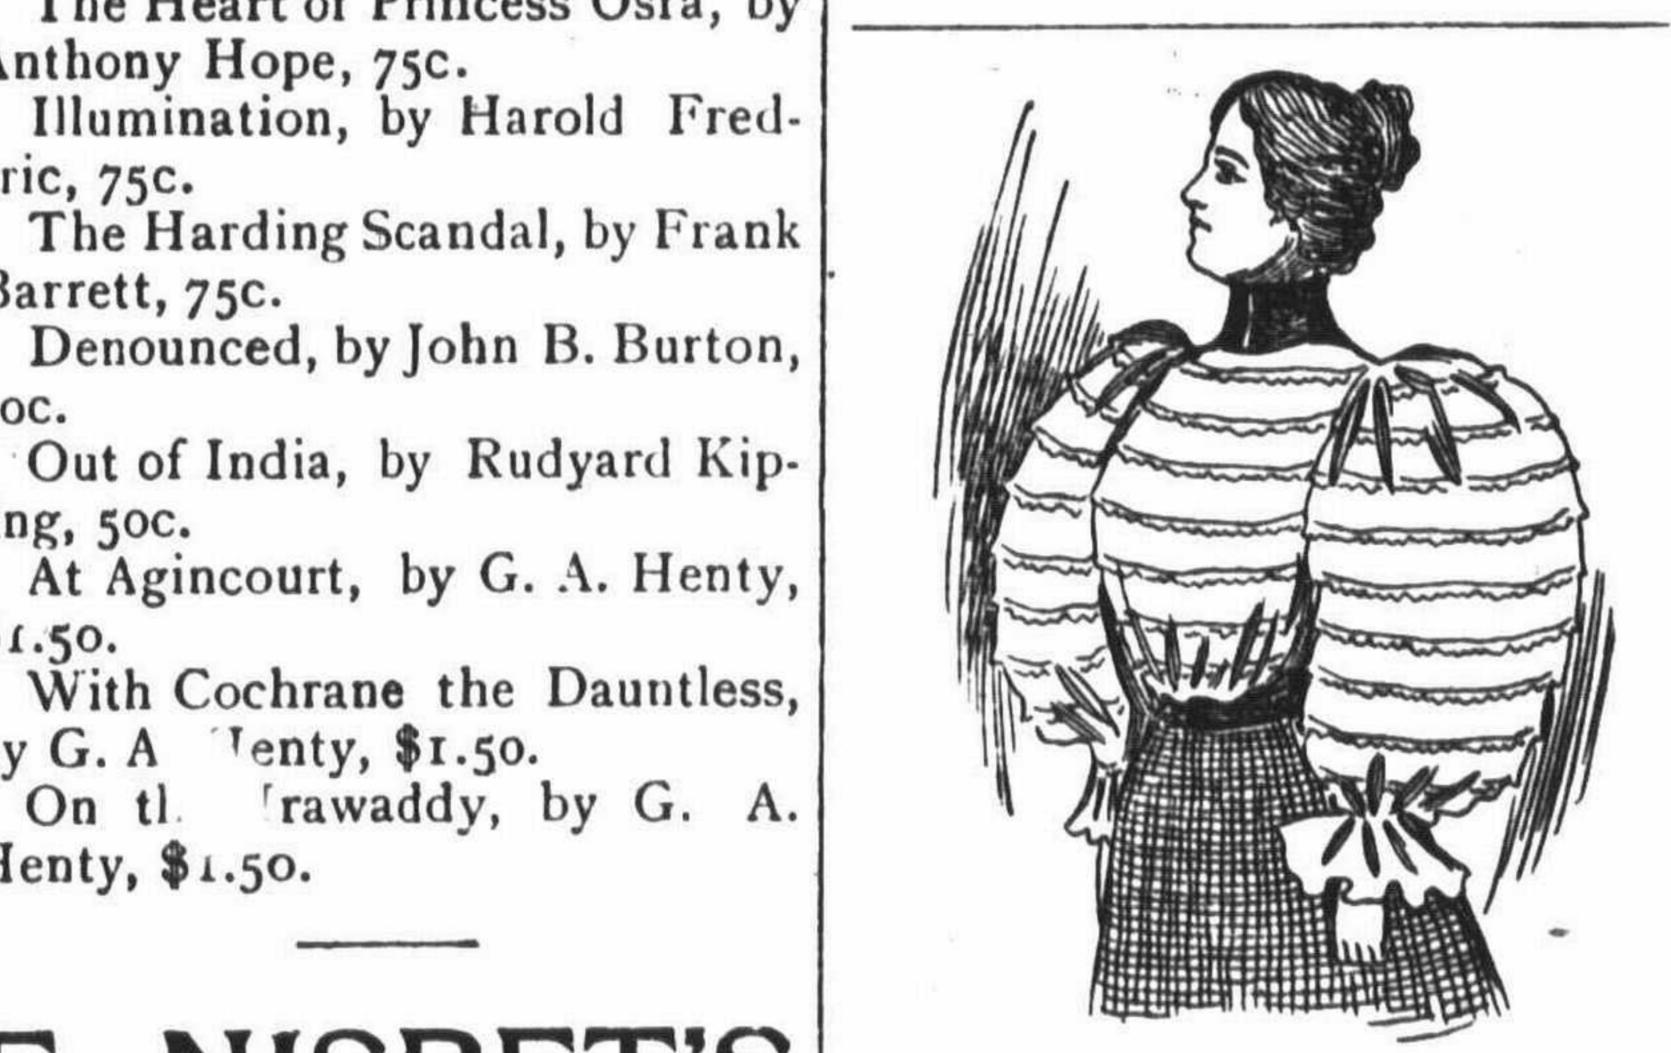

For service a skirt of navy blue canvas cloth, of broadcloth, or serge, nothing can equal it; while for dressy wear a smart skirt of navy blue crepon, or canvas cloth over silk, is beyond compare. White or scarlet, or a touch of gold brightens up a gown wonderfully, and is used as a color point on many of the new fall gowns. One of the prettiest of these blue gowns I have seen is made up of a soft-faced serge, with a perfectly plain, wide skirt, interlined with white taffeta. The bodice is in blouse effect, with the fulness at the back drawn smoothly into a narrow ribbon belt of white taffeta. A smooth vest of white taffeta is set in at the front, between two wide tucked box plaits. A folded stock of white taffeta is finished at the back by a full bow. The sleeves are snug to the shoulder, and closely wrinkled; the tight effect is taken away by the flaring of two wide ruffles set in at the shoulder, lined with white taffeta. Another chic blue gown has the entire cannot be surpassed in durability, successful operation and heating powers. Sold only a bodice laid over close rows of scarlet, gold and white braid, and a mass of tiny brass buttons at the front. There is no more useful adjunct to the winter toilette than some sort of a fanciful waist, not silk necessarily; it may be of some airy, light stuff over (one grows so weary of uncovered silk) or of some dainty cloth, prettily trimmed. These pretty waists are an item in to a figure which has retained its slender girlishness; crosswise lines will never answer for the form given over to embonpoint, but even for such the bodice may be trimmed, and with frills too, only they must be placed in perpendicular lines from throat to belt, and instead of the belt of velvet or ribbon, lengthen the bodice into a point, both back and Curls on the Water. The main terror of her who ventures lown to the sea in ships is the too often realized dread that the hair will come out of curl. What can be done to avoid so dire a catastrophe I know not, nor does anyone else, that is if the hair is o the sleek kind that no dampening with cold tea suffices to make it stand up for itself. I fear when hair is of this kind. there really is nothing for it but to invost in a neat fringe of naturally curling hair. Do, for goodness sake however, if driven to this extremity, make sure and adopt the additional precaution of wearing a veil, for where breezes blow they have a playful habit of disheveling, disagreeable enough with one's own hair, ses. Of course, this advice need only be can be made to curl ashore in dry weather. Those who do not like to take it at any time, had better give up all attempt at curling, and let their locks lie sleek, else they will only look untidy.

A Girl's Dress. A pretty little girl's dress for rough wear has the skirt carried out in blue serge, as is the blouse part of the bedice. The square yoke finishing, into which the bodice is mounted, is of white flannel, as are the epaulets, and these were closely braided with dark blue tubular braid, in a somewhat elaborate fashion.
