After nearly a year's use of SIMSON'S JINIMENT, I have proved it to be what I supposed at first it was. An excellent liniment to have about a stable. I have used in cases of cuts, galls, bruises and sprains on my horses and in every case found in the sores, as in cases of sprains and bruises, in a short time.

Nothing has presented itself to me that so effectively relieves and prevents the horse distemper.

I have also found it of very great service both in my own family and in the for a considerable period before death is families of my men in cases for which it is intended to be useful.

VERY CURIOUS SUBJECT.

What is Death ?- Reason for Believing it is Not a Painful Process-Looked at Medieatly and Psychologically-No Fear of Death After Long Illness,

Rochester Herald. suffocation due to the irregularity in the action of the heart and lungs, and above all an intense mental anguish. But when death pain, in whatever part it ceases to be perceived, the heart may beat with still greater irregularity, the lungs fail still more to dissipate the fear or remorse or that have harrassed the dying perwill, are blunted and no merly moved them.

Death as we see it in persons who have suffered from more or less protracted illness in a few minutes of time. It may even last for several hours, during which period the vital forces are extinguished little by little, so gradually in fact that we are not able to determine the exact instant at which life becomes extinct

Physiologists speak of death as occurring through the cessation of the action of either the brain or the heart or the lungs. But the brain cannot be regarded as an organ absolutely essential to life, however necessary it may be to its regular and systematic course. The entire organ may be removed from certain kinds of animals, and yet life goes almost as perfectly for a time as though it were still there to dominate the rest of the body. The heart beats, the lungs respire, the stomach digests, and the several lands continue to elaborate the secretions proper to them, and not only all this but actions are performed which are well calculated to excite astonishment in those who see them for the first time and who have embraced the idea that all intelligence resides in the brain. I hus, for instance, if the brain be entirely removed from the head of a frog, and the web between the toes pinched, the limb is immediately withdrawn; if the shoulder be scratched with a needle the hind foot of the same side is raised to remove the instrument; if the animal is held up by pathy-it immediately turns over on its belly; if one foot be held firmly with a pair of forceps the frog endeavours to draw it away : if unsuccessful, it places the other foot against the instrument and pushes firmly in the effort to remove it; still not suc ceeding it writhes the body from side to side and makes a movement forward. I have seen a rattlesnake strike after its head was cut off, and a viper has been known to craw straight for its hole in the wall after suffering like mutilation.

Nor are such experiments the only evidence we have that life may persist though the brain be absent. It sometimes happens that individuals of the human species are born without brains. In one instance of the kind life was present for six months. Though very feeble this being had the faculty of sucking and the several functions of the body seemed to be well performed. Its eyes clearly perceived the light and during the night it cried if the candle was allowed there was found after death no vestige of a brain, nevertheless respiration was established; the pupils contracted to light; bitter juice put in the month was immediately rejected and loud noises caused movements of the body. In another case in which the cranium was entirely empty life continued for four days, yet this being opened its eyes, cried, sucked, and even ate broth.

the action of all the organs of the body is more or less impaired, although they may continue their functions in such a manner as not to be immediately destructive of life. It is only when brain disease leads to the arrest of the action of the heart or lungs that death becomes inevitable.

Death beginning at the heart, occurring either as the result of brain injury or disease, or like factors affecting the organ it-A Year's Experience self, may take place suddenly or after a very considerable period of time has elapsed. In neither case is the act of death painful. Should the heart stop suddenly the brain is at once deprived of its due supply of blood, all sensibility is immediately abolished. There are a few imperfect respirations and life has vanished, probably without the stricken person having the slightest consciousness from the moment that the current of blood failed to reach his brain. to give relief at once, cleansing the cuts and | Such cases are comparatively infrequent, galls so that they heal rapidly, and reducing | but they are common enough for us to have become acquainted with the phenomena by which they are characterized. The respiration is difficult, the lungs are congested, there are periods characterized by faintness and loss of consciousness, the limbs and the face become dropsical, the recumbent posture is attended with increase on the feeling of suffocation due to the interference with the respiration, and hence the patient is obliged to pass the greater part of the day and night in a sitting posture. The countenance of a person thus afflicted is indicative of the distress which is constantly experienced. But when the physical forces become so far reduced that the act of dying supervenes, pain or discomfort is no longer felt and death ensues without there being any sensations but those of ease and comfort, both as regards mind and body. the condition produced by the inhalation of carbonic oxide gas, resulting from the combustion of charcoal, are examples of death beginning at the lungs. There are many cases on record of persons who have been recovered when thus poisoned, when the very extremity of life had been reached, and their evidence is uniformly to the effect that not only was there no pain, but that the act Firms. of dying, so far as they had experienced it, was a most delightful process.

l have seen a great many people die, some of them great sinners, even ruffians of the most degraded type, and I have never yet witnessed in any case the slightest fear of death or of a hereafter. I have also been present at the deathbeds of many pious and worthy persons, and I have never known an instance among this class of the least ap prehension in regard to the future. A person in sound health receiving intelligence that his death is to take place in a few moments would undoubtedly at first be greatly disturbed, and if religiously brought up would probably wish to make preparations for departing this life. But the case is very different with those who have suffered from a long illness and whose perceptions therefore have lost their sharpness. I have often told such persons that they had but a few | sip. minutes to live, but the intelligence has never been received in any other than the most composed and resigned manner. Certainly this is a wise provision of nature. For if as with his present knowledge it is possible for man to escape death, it is well that he is constituted as to be able to accept the inevitable with dignity and composure. WILLIAM A. HAMMQND.
