"Luff, Kit," he safet, "hand a-lee! Put her about. We missed her that time. Guess she must 'a fell off to loo'ard, sailin' so clus to the wind. We'll hev a better chance afore it. Now, then, full fur the spire, an' don't let her fall off, Kit-if anything, luff her a p'int."

The boat jibbed round, and filled away before the wind on the port quarter. Again they searched keenly, anxiously. They saw no spar; on they foamed. Kit's heart weighed like lead, and full of fear. The clump of cedars drew on only too swiftly. Another quarter of a mile, and they will be abreast! She stood up in her excitement, strained her sharp eyes-oh, how eagerly! She forgot the helm one moment; the boat's head fell away to lee. Tass did not notice. Suddenly he saw.

"Luff, Kit," he shouted-"hard a-lee! Hard, I say! you're off the course three

She seized the tiller, but she did not luff. She jammed it hard to port. Her face was radiant as an angel's. She laughed and pointed east.

"Hurrah!" she cried-"hurrah! hurrah! The mast! the mast!" Sure enough, there it was, the tip of a mast two feet above the tide. Never was a Will you do it? Will you! Will you!" I sight more joyful to heart of man than these two reet of wave wasned spar in Kit's glad eyes that day!

They ran alongside. The tide was rising now; the waves washed over it every time. It was somewhat out of the line between light and spire. It was deeper in the water, too. But for Kit's momentary forgetfulness they must have gone by and missed it. It was hit or miss, the simplest accident decided-chance, providence, fate, what you will. Marlin tore a shred of old muslintied it to the mast.

"It'll help us next time, Kit," he said. "Now for Rutherby!-fifteen mile to wind-'ard. Wind west, half no'the, an' pretty fresh. Put her about, Kit-hard a-lee-clus on the wind-there! Head her fur Kensel P'int. A long leg an' a short un."

Away they went, bowling breezily, bounding on the tumbling rollers. The sun sank behind the blue hills in the far northwest. Night drew on slowly. The light house lanterns flashed out one by one; the dusk deepened; the brightness died out of the west; it grew chilly. Old Tass got out the shawl which he had brought Kit. She wrapped it about her, sat silent-steering on, on. Old Tass sat a little forward on the weather side, his eyes wandering, his gray locks straggling from under his cap. He was a shrewd, by surprise. He sat down on a log, took off kindly old fellow. Frank and free as the sea he loved, without its deceitful wiles. If he liked you, you had a friend through thick and thin. If you wronged him, you made an enemy for life-not treacherous, but fearless, and almost unforgiving. He sat idle, and let Kit steer; he knew she was harassed by anxious thoughts of her father, alone at home, and that it was charity to let her have this task, that necessitated continual watchfulness, and might partially dissipate her gloomy meditations. He felt, as he watched her askance, a strange mingling of pity and admiration. So they sped on. The full moon swung up out of the east, and silvered the crested waves. The island shore approached nearer and nearer. They opened Hilbury bay after a while, and far in could see the gleam of the low light on the bar. Then Kensel Point drew on abeam and hid it from sight. Their course was straight for Gull reef. They ran close in; the white line of the wave washed ledge stretched shoreward before them. Then Marlin said:

"Luff, Kit! Put handbout! Luff a-lee!" The wind had veered meanwhile more to the north of west. The boat payed off again on the starboard tack. Kit looked back at the long, low neck. Beyond that ridge, onlytwo miles away as the crow flies, was her bome. How she longed to know what was go ing on there-how she fretted herself with anxious fears! Would she have gone or then had she known what a day would bring forth upon that spray white reef! She did not know; and the Bess went foaming on, northward, close to the wind.

The clocks in the town were striking the hour as they ran up Rutherby harbor through the anchored vessels, lying quietly head to wind, their red and green lanterns swinging in the fore shrouds. It was 2 o'clock. They tied the boat to the pier, climbed out, and went away up the deserted street.

"Ye're quite clear, are ye, Kit," asked Marlin, "as to what I told ye as we come along, how ye'd best talk to Ingram?"

"Quite clear," said Kit. They stopped at a small brick house. Marlin banged the krocker. A window opened above and a head appeared.

"Who's that knockin'! What d'ye want?" "That's him, Kit," said old Tass. "Speak him rough." "Do you want to find the Onward?" called

"Hold on a minute. I'll come down."

He opened the door presently. "Have you found her?" he asked, eagerly. Then recognizing Marlin, who stood with his back turned, he asked rather sullenly:

"What do ye want o' me, Tass Marlin? ain't been a-doin' anythink to ye." "Kit Grale," said old Tass without turning

-there was a strange gleam in the old gray eyes, and a look of righteous wrath in his weather beaten face-"ye may tell Gat Ingram that I've got nothin' to say to him, and no dealin' with him. This is your affair, not mine." "If you want to find the Onward," Kit said, "give me pen, paper and a light." He went in, Kit following, struck a light and brought writing materials. Marlin staid without. Kit sat down, took the pen and wrote. She was awkward with the pen, knew nothing of legal forms. She only knew that this money would save a soul from death, if it was not too late, and that this man would cheat her of it if he

She handed him the paper. This is what be read: RUTHERBY, July 20, 1858.

I hereby freely promise that, if I shall be shown, by Catharine Grale, of Kensel Point, the present position of the schooner Onward, and shall refuse or delay to pay immediately after to Catharine Grale, on showing, the advertised reward, I will pay to her an additional sum of equal amount ten days from date. "I won't sign it," he said. "D'ye think I'm a robber, miss?" "Then I've nothing more to say," she said. She walked out.

"Come, Cap'n Tass," she said. "He doesn't want the schooner. They started down the street. Ingram came running out.

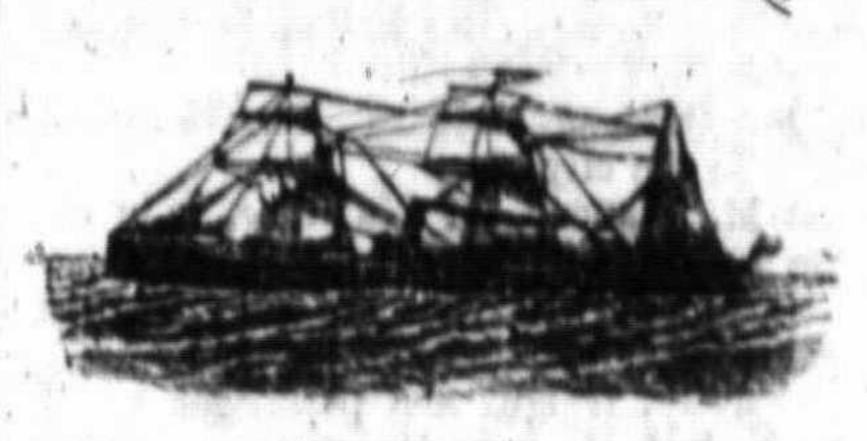

"Hold on!" he called. "What's the good o' bein' so sharp? I'll sign the cursed paper 'f ye'll gimme a chance." Two hours later they were in the Bess, in line with Goose Neck light and the white spire. They found the mast without much trouble. They then ran into the nearest harbor, went all three to a tavern. Ingram counted out the money, grudging every coin. Kit gave him the paper he had signed, and he went away. Kit and old Tass were together again alone. It was past 8. He made her eat some breakfast, and saw her safely off in the 8:30 express.
