What They Ate in 1837.

The dinners were conducted on primitive principles. Except in great houses, where the meat and game were carved by the butler, everything was carved on the table. The host sat behind the haunch of mutton and helped with zeal; the guests took the ducks, the turkey, the hare and the fowls, and did their parts, conscious of critical eyes. A dinner was a terrible ordeal for a young man who, perhaps, found himself called to dissect a pair of ducks. He took up the knife with Capt. Dowling of the Brigt. "Leo" of | burning cheeks and perspiring nose; now, at -ladies in those days know good carving, had, with a ghastly grin, to confess that he could not find those joints.

Then the dish was removed and given to another guest, a horribly self reliant creature, who laughed and talked while he dexterously sliced the breast and cut off the legs. If, in his agony, the poor wretch would take refuge in the bottle, he had to wait until some one invited him to take wine-horrible tyranny! The dinner table was ornamented with a great epergne of silver or glass. After dinner the cloth was removed, showing the table deep in color, lustrous, well waxed, and the gentlemen began real business with the bottle after the ladies had gone. - Fifty Years Ago, Walter Besant.

Where Mackenzie Was Strong.

By the side of such a whale as a real live emperor the biggest doctor is a very small minnow indeed, and the thrusting of his personality before the public, which only thinks of him in connection with the patient, is a violation of the laws of perspective which should be punishable as a nuisance. The world has heard enough of this wretched squabble, and is heartily sick of it. To sum up the business finally, it may be said that if the German medicos were theoretically right they were practically wrong. Sir Morell Mackenzie scored over them, as the man of tact and insight who can seize the essential features of the situation always will do over pragmatical pedants. He beat the heavy Germans all along the line-surgi- have awakened a spirit of ridicule in Paris. hearty breakfast, almost immediately after cally, socially and politically-and now that they have found breath to curse him, it is not strange that they should use the privilege.-London Truth.
