It is not wonderful that the great people of London, doing so little for themselves in the way of decorative beauty, do nothing whatever for the populace. An ugly cucumber frame like the Battersea Park hall, gaudily colored; a wagon drawn by poor suffering borses and laden with shrieking children gong to Epping Forest; open air preachers ranting hideously of hell and the devil; gin valaces, music balls and the flaring gas jets on barrows of rotten fruit, are all that Loncention for its multitudes. To drive through London anywhere is to feel one's eyes literally ache with the cruel ugliness and duliness of all things around, from the staring theatrical posters on the walls to the helmet of the burly policeman who takes half an hour to beat out a dog's brains.

Yet so much might be done to make London more picturesque at no very great cost. The trees which make the Paris boulevards such a glory of green leaves in May might have their likenesses in London streets. What an embellishment would an avenue be to Pall Mall, to Portland place, to Regent street, to Buckingham Palace road, to five hundred places. Quantities of trees planted all about the houses of parliament would take away that squalid and vulgar look which and of the noble abbey itself. If the many old gardens of the great houses which have been pulled down had been preserved they would have lent freshness, verdure and dignity to many thoroughfares of London. Hyde Park requires many more trees than it is planted with, and all the roads south and north of it might with advantage have avenues. Trees alone would remove the awful newness, nakedness and weight of bricks and stucco which lie like lead on the soul as one drives through Cromwell road, Ennismore Gardens and all the rest of the stony wilderness of South Kensington.

Then music, again, might easily be heard in the open air much oftener than it is if the military bands of the Household brigade, instead of being allowed to play for hire at pigeon shooting and horticultural fetes, and balls, private and public, and those various other innumerable engagements that take them here, there and everywhere, were made to play for the public in the metropolis every day in different quarters. To cite once more the example of Munich, how delightful the frequent bursts of military music at all hours make that pleasant city, what a gayety it lends to civic life, what a pleasure it gives to the very poorest! And how easy and how wise it would be to give the same gayety, the same pleasure to the jaded London crowds!

When I saw the London people watching and waiting so good humoredly for a small platoon of Life Guards and a few close carriages containing the royal family to pass on their way to a railway station, I thought what a pity it was not to give that unselfish and good natured crowd more out of door gatuitous enjoyment: not the sentimental trash of people's palaces, which only mew them up under a roof and make Pecksniff-Pasteurs out of them, but such enjoyment as one sees in the crowds of Paris, of Vienna, of Brussels, or 500 smaller cities all over Europe. Some ladies in bonnets, some gentlemen in tall hats, with a detachment or two of heavy cavalry, is all that the London multitudes see in the way of a royal progress. That they look out for this is an instance of that exceeding good nature and faculty for being amused by small things which are two qualities in them most unwisely, but most continually, neglected by their rulers.-Woman's World.

The Head of London's Police.

The supreme chief of the police and detectives is Sir Charles Warren, a man who has not the first qualification, either by nature or education, for the position he fills. He illustrates the so often unfortunate theory of primogeniture. Sir Charles had been a soldier, and served with fair credit, but had no executive experience or knowledge of police detail when he was placed in charge of the force of the greatest city in the world. If he had been a man content to pose as figurehead and allow the reins to be really held by capable lieutenants, not much harm would have been done, but unfor unately he is a gouty, irascible, stubborn old martinet, who insists upon managing affairs solely to suit himself. He must certainly have succeeded, for he has suited nobody else.

In person Sir Charles could be best described as beefy. He looks like the English comedy major one sees on the stage, retired on half pay, who swears by The Times and swears at everything else. He is said to have urged the secretary not to offer a reward in the Whitechapel affair, which is probably the case, as such a step would bring a multitude of shrewd private detectives into the case, and Scotland Yard is not fond of rivalry. A rather curious fact, but one that explains away a good deal of failure, is that the best men of the office are constantly at work on political matters. In the turbulent state of British politics the party in power always has plenty of detective work to be done, and the government resources are at their disposal. Such a thing is almost inconceivable in this country. - Baltimore Sun.

Scene in a Boston Restaurant.

A Boston man was seated at a table in a Boston restaurant the other day enjoying his noonday lunch. A late comer entered and took a seat at the same table, and, being evidently somewhat in a hurry, gave his entire order at the one time, but was chagrined to find that cold bread was served him instead of the warm biscuits he had expected. However, not to be wholly deprived of the luxury desired, he unceremoniously reached across to the domain of the earlier diner, picked up the solitary biscuit that remained on the latter's plate and commenced to eat it, whereupon the other, not to be outdone in the matter of a good reach and the ability to employ it, extended his arm, gathered in the piece of pie that belonged to the original offender, and proceeded to regale himself. "That is my pie, sir!" came the prompt protest. "That is my biscuit!" was the cold rejoinder. A silence followed, only broken by the patter of the waiter's feet upon the tessellated floor. -Boston Budget.

The Famous Bucktail Regiment. Sixty-three of the survivors of the famous Bucktail regiment have been holding a reunion in Bradford, McKean county, Pa. Each survivor present wore a bucktail in his bat, an emblem that made him the observed of all observers wherever he appeared. Banqueting and speeches were the order of the day, and the good people of Bradford did themselves proud in entertaining the few grizzled warriors that remain of this once famous regiment.—Chicago Herald.

Noiseless and Smokeless Locomotive. A novel locomotive engine is on exhibition at Palmyra, Wis. Except the noise of its wheels moving upon iron rails it is noiseless and smokeless. The steam after use in the engines is condensed in a new manner, and the water at the boiling point is reused. All the wheels of this locomotive are drive wheels, being so arranged as to give them easy control of the car on curves and on uneven tracks. - Chicago Herald.
