A child went one day to one of the great modern dry goods stores in the city, where they sell laces rich and rare, silks and satins and velvets beyond price, jewels worth a king's ransom, harness, curry combs, boots, shoes, dress fabrics delicate as cobwebs and filmy as moonlight, socks, chest protectors, Bibles, faro layouts and poker chips, hymn books and pocket flasks, revolvers and "God bless our homes," telescopes and baby rattles, dery silk and manilla cables, perfumes tles, ruching, jewel caskets, cuspidors, and one thing and another, and where the change is made and transmitted, by an elaborate system of elevated railways fifteen cents' worth of needles and tape, was waited on promptly by a charming saleslady, to whom he gave a silver quarter. She sent it via the pneumatic tube to the cashier's desk and kindly asked the child to sit down and wait a moment for his change. Time rolled on, rolled on. It kept on rolling. . . Into the described store one day, an angel, walking down the empty street, cast his eyes and quickly followed the direction of his glance. He touched the figure of an old man, who leaned wearily against the counter, while his silver hair and snowy beard fell to the floor in a fleecy shower. "Why," said the angel, "come; what are you doing here? We have been looking for you everywhere for 200 years. Everybody else has been gone from this world two centuries gone. What are you doing here?" "I did not hear anything about it," said the old man wearily. "I am waiting for my change." A Small Matter,

Apropos of the theater, they are telling a good story about town at the expense of a certain clubman, well known in the | "I have used every remedy for sick headcoulisse, who is famous for the ready floridity of his promises on any and every occasion, and, as a matter of course, for the invariability with which he never keeps any of them. Over a table at the Hoffman house, the other evening, a theatrical acquaintance confided to him the fact that he had a magnificent scheme for a showpiece if he could only find the capital to perfect it.

"How much do you require?" asked X. "I ought to have $25,000, but I might scrape along with $20,000 at the start." "Is that all? Gad! I'll let you have it," said X, in his usual offhand way. "Oh, come now!" returned his friend.

"You don't mean it." "Well, I just do. You can have it tomorrow if you want it. Meet me here at 8 o'clock-and, by the way, if I should, by any chance, not be able to wait, I'll leave it at the cigar counter for you."-New York Letter in Pittsburg Bulletin.
