The wave of scientific discovery sight of them. which began to rise and move forward with the opening years of the century has swept on with increasing velocity up to the prethe condition of civilized man that the man's progress had been by trial and error, a groping process; learning by mistakes. But now he has made some more desirable Stylish Dress than fine considerable approach to scientific exactitude in his development. Those great mistakes—wars and bloody revolutions—are now largely avoided. By the extension of systems of guarantee, insurance, and reserve funds, the misery consequent upon commercial companies, extensive conflagrations, etc., is greatly lessened, superior quality at 40c the yard, left in the hands of a few patient toilers, scientific discovery itself, instead of beingoften half starved because they had no friends in Montreal cannot afford to miss time to earn a living, is new organized by this opportunity.

Since the birth of those who are now students at college instruments like the dynamo, the electric light, the electric railway, the telephone, with all their accompaniments, have passed from the state of mere scientific apparatus into accessities of daily life. During the same period the few mineral and vegetable colors to which manufacturers were restricted have been replaced or supplemented by the thousand vivid coal tar colors. Principally by improvements in steam engines the speed of ocean steamships has been increased from thirty to forty per cent. The horseless carriage has appeared on the scene and the bicycle has become a recognized vehicle. Butter and cheese are made on scientific principles and with scientific cleanlineas. Many-headed disease has been tracked to its lair, and some of its heads lopped off. The weak hand and arm of man has been replaced by big iron hands and arms of resistless might, moving with ease and percision. In control of physical forces man has reached a height never before attained.
