The Qualifications Of a Good Servant Are Set Forth.

Among the many suggestions made to the license inspector as to what he ought of visitors to the city on that day in conthe crowded market square, he was met are paid by results. by two prominent and well-known citizens in company, one of whom accosted him and enquired what he intended to do on the morrow, and suggested, as others had done before, that he had better leave town on that day or shut his eyes and ears as to what might occur. On being informed that he had no such intentions, the citizen referred to asked the inspector if he knew the qualifications of a good servant. Without returning an answer he awaited the forthcoming description of such an in dividual, which was to the effect that a few years ago a gentleman of Kingston noted for his admiration of the fair to take a drive into the country, which was cordially accepted. He took along with him his Irish footman, whom the relator named Tom. After an hour's drive the party arrived at a picturesque grove on the bay shore where the gentleman and his lady friend alighted and wandered into a beautiful grove, skirting the water front, leaving Tom behind to take charge of the outfit and await their return. His innate curiosity becoming unusually aroused as to the beauty of the place and the movements of the party, he, as soon as he supposed them to be at a safe distance to dispel any idea of his espionage, stealthily made a move in the direction they had gone, and in a short time got his eye on them, and came satisfied with sight-seeing he hastened back to the carriage, where in due time | ter. the pair joined him, entered the carriage
