Queen Victoria has outlived nearly all of her contemporaries. This is perhaps not a fresh piece of news. brought to mind just now in a peculiarly vivid manner by the fact that of those coronation of her Majesty, only four remain to figure in the grand diamond

They are the Earl Nelson, who, as a 13-year-old peer donned his silver coronet for the only time in his life at the moment when the Archbishop of Canterbury solemnly placed the crown of Great Britain upon the head of the Queen; the patriarchal Earl of Leicester, who acted on that occasion as page of honor and train-bearer to the sovereign's uncle, the Father of the House," who at the age of 95 still takes part in the deliberations of Both Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Villiers witnessed the Queen's coronation from Trains Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 run daily. No. 5 served for the accommodation of the daily except Monday. All other trains daily members of the first Parliament of the present reign.

With these four notable exceptions, all those who stood near the sovereign during the first moiety of her occupancy of the throne have departed for another world, preceding her to that land from whence no traveler-not even Anointed of the Lord,'-ever returns. The Archbishop who crowned her, the ministers and statesmen from whom she sought counsel in her youthful inexperience, the great soldier, Arthur, Duke of Wellington, who performing the functions of Lord High Constable of the Realm carried the great Sword of State before her, nay even the very titled maidens who bore her train, all twelve of them daughters of dukes, have every one of them gone down to the grave before her. This in itself cannot fail to endow the gorgeous spectacle in Westminster

Abbey a few weeks hence with a certain degree of pathos, especially when the venerable sovereign of the British Empire will be seen making her slow and difficult way up the nave-so truly alone will leave KINGSTON daily (Sunday excepted) and lonesome in the midst of the vast and leave KINGSTON daily (Sunday excepted) and magnificently attired throng—to the thousand-year-old throne of King Edward the Confessor.

Few who have seen Westminster Abbey on ordinary occasions would recognize the ancher fane on that day. For tier upon tier of seats, thronged with beautifully attired women, and men arrayed in uniforms glittering with every degree of magnificence will fill all available space. The participants in this unique pageant, indeed, will be so closely packed together that each gothic frame of stone will have its dazzling living picture, while the hoary walls of England's grand metropolitan minister will seem hidden animated and literally palpitating with enthusiastic loyalty. The religious portion of the ceremony will be short, the direction thereof being entrusted to the archbishops of Canterbury and of York, to the bishop of London and to the dean of the Abbey, all four of whom for this occasion will wear those magnificent gold embroidered, purple velvet mantles with long trains that are known as their coronation robes. It will consist of a "Te Deum" composed by the Queen's lamented husband, of a superb chorale likewise by the Prince Consort and commencing with the words, "Because thy God loved Israél, therefore made He the King to do justice and judgment, 'the national anthem being introduced in a manner peculiarly thrilling and effectiive.

Then the Archbishop of Canterbury, himself now on the threshold of his eightieth year, will intone the "Thanksgiving," as well as the prayers for the Queen while the solemn blessing delivered from the altar by the aged primate, followed by slow and sustained "Amens chanted by the choir of three hundred surpliced men and boys, stationed in the organ gallery, will bring to a close this impressive and unique divine service.
