F. S. Hammond, the New England man who proposes to bless Boston by damming the straits of Belle Isle, seems to be theroughly in earnest about his project for changing the climate of the north Atlantic coast. He is organizing a company which is to have a capital of $100,000,000 and promises that if he can raise that amount he will banish the cold east wind, which is the special bane of Boston and the whole New England coast, within a few months after he begins operations. He would build the dam in winter when the straits are frozen over. Rock blasted from the face of the cliffs on the mainland could be dumped at the desired spot by cutting a hole in the ice, and thus the dam could be built up until it reached the required height. Of course it would take a good deal of rock, but then Mr. Hammond is used to figuring in big round numbers. He doesn't expect to change the climate of a dozen states with a few
