A WOMAN'S NEW YORK LETTER.

From a Marble Works to a Singer's Boudoir—In the Home Temple of an Erotic Poetess—The Distasteful Assignment of a City Editor Accepted.

[Copyright, 1890.]

NEW YORK, March 27.—The newspaper woman is one of the triumphs of Nineteenth century civilization.

Let us follow one of them through a day of her busy life, look through her eyes and hear with her ears. Do not take one of those phenomenal young women who are daily astounding the universe by their extraordinary exploits, but an ordinary, plodding, digging hard worker—a feminine free lance, who writes for a half dozen different papers under as many nom de plumes.

AT THE MARBLE WORKS.

On a rainy spring morning, when the dull light struggles into the little bedroom of a little flat a long way up town, she turns languidly on her pillow and drowsily comes back from dreamland. How good the bed yet seems; how she would love to lie an hour or so longer. But as she stares blinkingly at the picture at the foot of her bed, she suddenly remembers where she is, who she is, her excuse for living and the day's work before her. Good gracious! What time is it? She has an interview this morning, beside she must go copy hunting from the Battery to Harlem. There is another interview at 2 o'clock and an appointment at an editor's office to talk over an assignment, and then, to-night, newspaper woman try to pin her down and find out just what the doctrine is which the lady promulgates. All is eloquent mysticism—a current of beautiful and meaningless rhetoric, and the writer leaves the room with a vague sense of having passed through some intellectual cyclone.

It is now nearly 4 o'clock. Our scribbler cannot see the city editor, with whom she has an appointment, until a quarter of 6. Two hours. What shall she do with them? She suddenly recalls that in a street hard by lives the author of a volume of lurid verse, which the critics are just now dissecting. She will try to see her. So hastening to the lady's apartment, she is at once admitted. To her dismay she finds the fair poetess surrounded by a bevy of adoring female friends, to whom she is reading notices of her book and reciting bits of her own verse. She greets the new comer cordially and presents her to her friends. Then the rites are begun anew.

Amid sympathetic sighs and soft little groans the authoress reads her poem on the birth of love, in which she has no scruples about calling things by their proper names.

Presently the poetess concludes her reading and one of her adorers drops on her knees beside her and sprawling upon her lap, looks up into her face with yearning, "O, Sappho, she murmurs rapturously, "for you are our Sappho—teach us the secret of your divine fire. How, how can you think of these heavenly lines?" Another "dearest" hands Sappho a flower and begs her to kiss it and it will be eternally preserved. But about this time our newspaper woman is so distracted that, pleading an engagement, she goes away, and, once outside this temple of the Muses, draws a long breath of relief.

The rain is pouring down. Her skirts are draibled, she is tired out, but she has yet to go down to the office of one of the daily papers to hear the "suggestions" of the city editor. She has to wait some time in a dreary, gloomy room, through whose dusty windows she looks out upon brick walls and watches the ghastly gleam of the electric lights and the ceaseless drip of the rain. At last the editor, a cool, self contained young man, with big, blase eyes, comes in, and, after a careless "Good evening," begins to lay out his plans.

As he proceeds our little woman feels as if she were slowly turning to stone, so repulsive is the nature of the undertaking which he is blocking out. "I can't do it," she gasps; "I really could not do that." An amused smile curls his lips: "Could not?" he asks. "Why not? You can't afford to be squeamish in the newspaper business. We want this done and we know you can do it satisfactorily. We will pay you well." She shakes her head obstinately. "Well," he continues, "think it over and let me know to-morrow. You'd best decide to do it. Nobody will recognize you. You can wear a veil if you like."

Out again into the rainy, muddy streets. Once more upon the train flying homeward now. She thinks of the dear little flat so cozy and pleasant. How good it will be to get home. She leans her tired head back against the window and dozes until her station is called. Then, while walking the few blocks to her flat, she thinks again, with sinking heart, of her editor's suggestion. "I cannot do it," over and over she says. But after her dinner, when the doctor comes in and shakes his head dubiously over the invalid for whom our scribbler is working; when the maid tells her the coal is out and hands her the gas bill and mentions incidentally that the agent called about the rent; when she sees how shabby her boots are getting and vaguely wonders where the spring frock is coming from, then the sum the city editor mentioned he would give for the work he desired seems of infinite proportions.

She writes for two or three hours on syndicate work and out of town correspondence, smiling a trifle sadly as she describes lace trimmed petticoats, silk stockings and the latest fashionable fads, for she remembers all her old ambitions when she fondly expected to clear a way to fame with her pen. That which has to lift her to fortune's heights has become simply ways and means to get bread and butter.

The long hours creep by, and at midnight she finishes her work. Then, after a few moments of deep thought, she draws a sheet of paper toward her and writes a note to the city editor in which she tells him that on deliberation she has concluded to take the assignment of which they were talking that afternoon, and for the sum which he named she will write up her experiences in an opium den. With a shudder of disgust she seals the letter and addresses it. Then, worn out from the labors of the day, she seeks the little bedroom. With a hasty prayer she presses her head against the pillow and is soon fast asleep. One day in a newspaper woman's life is ended.

Luminous paint absorbs light during the day and gives it forth at night. The ceiling of an English car painted with the composition lights the vehicle at night. England had the only factory and charged $3 a pound for the paint, but a new factory in Triesch, Austria, is selling it for fifty cents per pound. It is made of roasted oyster shells and sulphur.

The White House stables are a pretty group of brick buildings situated on a lot south of the mansion and sheltered by a row of box trees. There are four horses for the use of the president's family, three bays and a gray. One of the bays is named John and he is of a remarkably gentle nature and extremely fond of eating sugar from Mrs. Harrison's hand.

The English government is building a dry dock at Gibraltar of sufficient capacity to hold the largest iron clad, and there is much bitter feeling in Spain, and also in France, at this new assertion of England's unalterable determination to preserve her dominance in the historic sea that laves Malta and Cyprus and is the waterway to her Indian empire.

A few days ago John Ball, of Rochelle, Ga., had a log rolling, and about 12 o'clock, while the men were at dinner, an old hen came in the house, jumped upon the bed, deposited an egg, which one of the small children took to carry to his mother, and on the way accidentally dropped the egg, which was broken, and to the astonishment of those present it was found to contain a chicken fully developed.

A Trip to Manitoba.

Last year I went to Manitoba on the C.P.R. At Rat Portage I got sick, and at Winnipeg I was so weak I had to be assisted off the train. AN INDIAN'S PICTORIAL DIARY.

How a Sioux Warrior Chronicled His Various Bloody Deeds.

In 1868, while returning to Nebraska City from Montana, one J. S. Moore met the Sioux chief Half Moon. They mutually objected to each other's existence, and when the subsequent debate ended Mr. Moore was dead. Among the various articles of which Half Moon rifled the corpse were a blank note book and pencils. With the materials

thus procured the chief began a pictorial diary, and kept up his entries until June, 1876, when he fell at the battle of Rosebud. Then Mr. Moore's note book, embellished with barbaric drawings, came into the possession of a United States soldier, and eventually found its way back to civilization and the scrutiny of the curious in matters of primitive art.

The first entry made by Half Moon was a drawing of the killing of Moore. The white man is depicted in a high state of alarm, and he has dropped his revolver. In another illustration is recorded the chief's return from a successful horse raid. He invariably distinguishes between horses captured from the United States government, from citizens or from other Indians. The first are marked U. S., the second are shod and the third have no shoes. He depicts the killing of an army bugler, and shortly after slays a white man in his wagon. Nor are his exploits confined to men and horses. Twice he shows how he captured some squaws, and once three white women surrendered themselves.

But all the savage's art is not devoted to scenes of theft, violence and murder. In one elaborate drawing he celebrates his marriage. The Sioux wedding obligations are taken mutually over a stream or some vessel of water. In Half Moon's case a coffee pot served the purpose. A second picture shows the happy pair, covered with the same blanket, going to their tepee. In all there are seventy-seven sketches, indicating that the diary keeper was either a Munchausen or one of the most industrious scalp takers and horse lifters the American prairies have ever known.

A Society Event in Vienna.

DELIVERING THE GUEST.

The "Lumpen" or "Bummers'" ball is one of the great annual events at Vienna, and is patronized by the Austrian aristocracy and even royalty itself. The one given recently in Schwendes' Colosseum attracted over 3,000 persons. A strictly enforced rule was for every one to go attired as a rogue of some sort. A grim collection of thieves, beggars, burglars, idiots, hangmen, drunkards, etc., was the result. Among the queer features of the affair were the arrivals of guests in wooden boxes or coffins. Many were driven to the door on express wagons, while others were carted by hand in wheelbarrows.

All kerosene lamps should be filled in the daytime and at a regular hour. They must not be too full; they must be very carefully wiped off. The globes and chimneys should be kept clean and clear. The wicks are best trimmed by simply rubbing off the charred surface. The light is often affected by the holes in the burner becoming clogged. This can be remedied by boiling the burners in a strong solution of washing soda.

There are now 30 crematories situated in various parts of the world; Italy has 23; America has 10; while England, Germany, France, Switzerland, Denmark and Sweden have one apiece; in Italy there were 2 cremations in 1876; the number rose to 15 in 1877, and in 1888 the number was 226; since 1876, 1,177 cremations have taken place in Italy, while the combined number in all other countries brings the total to only 1,209.

Holloway's Pills.

In the complaints peculiar to females these pills are unrivelled. Their use by the fair sex has become so constant for the removal of their ailments that rare is the household that is without them. Amongst all classes, from the domestic servant to the peeress, universal favor is accorded to these renovating pills. Their invigorating and purifying properties render them safe and invaluable in all cases. They may be taken by females of all ages for any disorganization or irregularity of the system, speedily removing the cause and restoring the sufferer to robust health. As a family medicine they are unapproachable for subduing the maladies of young and old.

A Remarkably Poised Stone.

A remarkably poised rock, famous throughout South America as "the moving stone," may be seen, says The Industrial World, on Tandil mountain, in Buenos Ayres. It is 24 feet high, 30 feet long and 18 feet wide, containing over 5,000 cubic feet and weighing 35 tons. It is irregularly conical in shape and rests upon a conical support with a bearing surface some 10 inches in diameter. The power of a single man is sufficient to oscillate the enormous mass, which, indeed, is often swayed by the wind.

Paul Du Chaillu, the Writer.

Paul Du Chaillu was born in Paris in 1835. He is under the average height, round shouldered and not at all handsome, though his face is strong and forehead commanding. He is vivacious in manner and has an inexhaustible fund of anecdotes. During his first trip into Africa he shot and stuffed more than 2,000 birds, at least sixty of which were species before unknown. He also killed more than 1,000 animals, among them several gorillas, a species probably never before seen by Europeans.

The Utopia of the American Negro.

Dixie, a popular name for the southern states of the Union, and much in use about the time of the secession, was adopted from a song of the slaves, which set forth the delights of a region where they were under a good master—the region being called Dixie Land, from a well known kindly slaveholder of that name. The old song, or one based upon it, became widely favored as a sectional rival of "Yankee Doodle."

The Finger Prayer Book.

The smallest prayer book in the world is the Finger prayer book, lately issued from the University press of Oxford, England. It contains 670 pages, measures 3¼ by 1 inches and weighs three-fourths of an ounce. It is beautifully printed on fine paper.

Stranger Than Fiction.

The common saying, "stranger than fiction," may be traced to Canto xiv, stanza 101, of Byron's "Don Juan:"

'Tis strange—but true; for truth is always strange,
Stranger than fiction.

When baby was sick, we gave her Castoria,
When she was a child, she cried for Castoria,
When she became Miss, she stuck to Castoria,
When she had chil dren, she gave them Castoria.

Josephine Jottings.

It is a privilege to recommend Hagyard's Yellow Oil. It is a sure cure for chapped hands, swellings, sore throat, croup, etc.

MRS. GEO. WARD, Josephine P.O., Ont.

To cure croup give ten to thirty drops of Yellow Oil on sugar internally, and rub the throat and chest with the Oil. It never fails.
