"THE TOWN OF FIRE"

BAKU, THE RUSSIAN CITY ON THE CASPIAN SEA.

Plain of Diabolical Aspect, Enveloped in Smoke Traversed by Tongues of Flame—Springs of Oil so Abundant it is Impossible to Store Their Overflow.

Tiflis, midway on the railway that cut the Caucasus in R. wh de saith and puts the two seas in communication—the port of Batoum on the Black sea, with that of Baku on the Caspian. As we leave the capital in the latter direction, says Vlacount Eugene Melchoir de Vogue in Harper's Magazine, the eye is at first ravished and then desolated by the changing aspects of the land. The track follows the Kour, which rolls its broad sheet of water majestically through wild forests and rich, tilled soil, with two chains of snowy ridges stretch away out of sight in the distance—the Caucasus to the left, the mountains of Armenia to the right. Soon we leave the river, which goes to join the Araxes toward the south; the plain gets broader and barer, tall cages built of planks perched on four tree-trunks rise in the midst of the rice-fields like watch-towers. The inhabitants of the villages, who are all Tartars in this region, take refuge at night in these aerial nests. The marshy land is so unhealthy that it is dangerous to sleep there. In spite of these precautions the peasants whom we see are devoured by fever. Their emaciated visages remind us of those of the inhabitants of the Roman Campagna. After leaving Hadji-Caboul, the station in Moorish style where a new line branches off—"the Teheran line," I am told by the engineers who are building it, and who hope to carry it into the very heart of Persia—we enter an African landscape, sad and luminous. The mountain chains become lower; they are now simply cliffs of gilded sandstone festooning against a crude blue sky. At their feet, the desert, a sandy expanse, covered here and there with a ryes ca pet of flowering tamarisks. Herds of camels browse on these shrubs, under the guard of a half-naked shepherd, motionless as a bronze statue. The fantastic silhouettes of these animals are increased in size and changed in form by the effect of the mirage, which displays before our eyes, in the ardent haze of the horizon, lakes and forests. From time to time we meet a petroleum train, composed of cistern trucks in the form of cylinders, surmounted by a funnel with a short, thick neck. When you see them approaching from a distance, you might mistake them for a procession of mastodons, vying in shapelessness with the trains of camels which they pass. The sun burns in space. Yonder a green band glitters beneath its rays; it is the Caspian. We turn around a hill, and behold! on this western shore, in this primitive landscape, which seems like a corner of Arabia Petræa, a monstrous city rises before our eyes. Is it one more the effect of mirage, this town of diabolical aspect, enveloped in a cloud of smoke traversed by running tongues of flame, as it were; Sodom fortified by the demons in its girdle of cast-iron towers? I can find but one word to depict exactly the first impression that it gives; it is a town of gasometers. There are no houses—the houses are relegated farther away on the right, in the old Persian city—nothing but iron cylinders, and pipes, and chimneys, scattered in disorder from the hills down to the beach. This is doubtless the fearful model of what manufacturing towns will be in the twentieth century. Meanwhile for the moment, this one is unique in the world; it is Baku—the "Town of Fire," as the natives call it; the petroleum town, where everything is devoted and subordinated to the worship of the local god.

The bed of the Caspian sea rests upon a second subterranean sea, which spreads its floods of naphtha under the whole basin. On the eastern shore the building of the Samarcand railway led to the discovery of immense beds of mineral oil. On the western shore, from the most remote ages, the magi used to adore the fire springing from the earth at the very spot where its last worshippers prostrate themselves at the present day. But after having long adored it, impious men began to make profit by it commercially. In the thirteenth century the famous traveler Marco Polo mentioned "on the northern side a great spring whence flows a liquid like oil. It is no good for eating, but it is useful for burning and for all other purposes; and so the neighboring nations come to get their provision of it, and fill many vessels without the ever-flowing spring appearing to be diminished in any manner." The real practical working of these oil springs dates back only a dozen years. At the present day it yields 2,000,000 kilograms of kerosene per annum, and disputes the markets of Europe against the products of Kentucky and Pennsylvania. The yield might be increased tenfold, for the existing wells give on an average 40,000 kilograms a day, and in order to find new ones it suffices to bore the ground so saturated is the whole soil with petroleum. C. Marvin ("The Petroleum Industry in Southern Russia") compares the Apsheron peninsula to a sponge plunged in mineral oil. The soil is continually vomiting forth the liquid lava that torments its entrails either in the form of mud volcanoes or of natural springs. The springs overflow in streams so abundant that it is hopeless to store their contents for want of reservoirs; often they catch fire and burn for weeks; the air, impregnated with naptha vapors, is then aglow all round Baku.

A Unique Calculation.

The writer is the owner of a curious little book published by Gasper Schott in 1577, entitled, "Magia Universalis Naturæ et Artis," wherein the author, among many other odd things, attempts mathematical calculation of the number of "graces and glories." According to his computation there are exactly 115,792,089,237,...16,195,423,570,985,008,687,907,853,269,984,665,640,564,039,457,584,007,913,129,639,936, which will surely be enough to go around and have plenty of grace and glory left. In proof that his calculation is accurate he says that the sum represented by the above figures is the two hundred and fifty-sixth power of the number two. What the number two and its two hundred and fifty-sixth power has to do with grace and glory he does not say. Others have attempted to solve the problem by transposing in every possible way the letters in the well-known question: "Thy graces, O Virgin, are told where the stars of heaven are numbered."—St. Louis Republic.

Parliament Houses Crumbling.

The British Parliament houses are crumbling to pieces so fast that there is constant danger of some portion of the buildings toppling down on the members. Parts of the front of St. Stephen's have had to be entirely refaced because of the wearing away of the soft stone. Only a week or two ago a heavy piece of a stone heraldic animal suddenly fell close to the entrance to Westminster Hall, in Old Palace yard—a means of entrance to the house which is largely favored. But a few days before a portion of the ornamental stonework fell close to the members' entrance itself, and another heavy piece fell on the pavement of New Palace yard not a month ago.

Murder of an Aged Hermit.

Unknown scoundrels recently murdered Mathias Berger, an old man who lived the life of a hermit on Blue mountain, five miles north of Hamburg, Pa. The crime was disclosed only through the accidental visit of some neighbors, who found Berger's cabin vacant. A searching party discovered the hermit's dead body in an advanced state of decomposition lying among some rocks on the mountain not far from his cabin. His clothes were torn almost into shreds, and there were marks on the ground of a terrible struggle. A club stained with blood lay within a few feet of the body.

The unfortunate hermit had $1,600 on deposit in a Reading bank, and had some gold and silver coin about him in the cabin, it is known, before his death. None of it can be found now. He was a frequent visitor to Reading and Hamburg, and many people predicted that he would meet with a tragic end if he persisted in remaining on the mountain.

A Sad Suicide.

A very sad suicide of recent occurrence was that of Miss Genevieve Greene, a beautiful young native of Vermont, who got out of funds while giving art lessons at Newnan, Ga. Penniless and among strangers she shot herself, just at the time when kind hearted people were raising a purse for her benefit.

After the Engagement.

"Did he get on his knees?"
"No; he couldn't."
"Why not?"
"I got there first."—Puck.

Sandwiches at Delmonico's.

A lot of men were playing poker at Delmonico's the other night. The party got a little hungry and ordered some sandwiches. They came—a small appetizing plate; also the bill, $14. Shortly afterward a quiet gentleman asked the waiter to pass him another sandwich. "All gone, sir," was the reply. The quiet gentleman beckoned to the waiter and said in a confidential way:

"All gone?"

"Yes, sir."

"Go down stairs and order some more."

"How many, sir?"

"Well," said the gentleman thoughtfully, glancing at the bill and the empty plate, "as I'm hungry, I should say about $2,000 worth.—Brooklyn Eagle.

A Joke for Boarders.

"You've left your old boarding house, I see."

"Yes, too expensive. Mrs. Hash feeds her boarders so well that they are continually outgrowing their clothes, and what they save in the cheap rates they lose in having to buy new suits."

Then both laughed a sardonic, diabolical, ironical laugh, which only boarders can understand and appreciate.—Philadelphia Times.

And Turned a Little Pail.

Muggins—Funniest thing happened the other day—Jones was trying to make his mule drink out of a bucket, when the animal kicked him.

Appropriate.

Valet—If I have to come upstairs again tonight I shall have to insist on your calling the "Bluff."

Master—Why, in Heaven's name?

Valet—Because I'm always being called.—Munsey's Weekly.

An Expressive Name for a Horse.

Brown—What's the name of that colt?

Jones—Ten-dollar Bill.

Brown—That's no kind of a name for a horse. What did you call him that for?

Jones—Because, dear boy, he'll go so fast when he's broken.—Puck.

"What is your husband's favorite foible, then?"

"The favorites at the races, I guess."—Munsey's Weekly.

A Noted Desperado Killed.

There was a big celebration of secret societies at Beulah, Ala., the other day. When the bands began to play a big, burly stranger, with streaming raven locks and a beard so long that he wrapped it around his waist, stepped out from the crowd and attempted to "run things" with the aid of an ugly looking dirk. Several people in the procession equally well armed protested, and when they got through with the stranger he was so badly cut up that he died soon after. Some one recognized him as Will Wallace, a noted desperado who had long terrorized the people of eastern Alabama and western Georgia.

He Used the Present.

Tom—Now tell me, Jack, did Johnson really say I was crazy?

Jack—No; he didn't—

Tom—Ah, I thought so.

Jack—Let me finish. He didn't use the past tense at all.—Yankee Blade.

Gold mounting is now being used on card-cases, pocket and prayer books, shopping and visiting tablets in lieu of the blackened silver corners.

Mushroom is the fashionable shade for gloves, low shoes and leather goods such as side-bags, coin-purses and field-glass case and belt.

Now there is a jockey sun-shade, with a peak cap for the knob and a cover of bright red, blue, green, orange and purple, streaked with white.

Some of the beaded bonnets are made of horse hair. Lined with some bright silk to throw out the design the effect is gayety materialized.

The Swedish glove is a sassafras kid of Suede finish and elbow length intended to tuck under the bishop sleeve just below the bend of the arm.

Hemstitching on some handkerchiefs is done in colored threads, but so delicately as to give not more than a faint suspicion of a colored border.

The correct walking glove for gentlemen is an undressed kid, tan shade, with wide braid on the back. For ushers at weddings pearl-gray are the thing.

The popularity of accordion plaiting has caused such a demand as to bring many into the business, and is now done in the very best style for 25 cents a yard.

Many fashionable ladies wear the Japanese tea-gown in gold and rich colors. It is of the crinkly crepe and gorgeous in floral figures. The underdress is of pale silk.

Accordion skirts lose their attractiveness when the plaits are allowed to flare. When firmly sewed down with tapes the plaits continue in form for a long time.

Swedish embroidery is the rage. The stitches are long and easily mastered and the use of colored silk and white canvas or linen makes the work interesting.

The only protection for the rebundant letter-writer is notepaper, 3½ by 6 inches. Onion and porcelain blue, robin's egg green and shell-gray are the tints most admired.

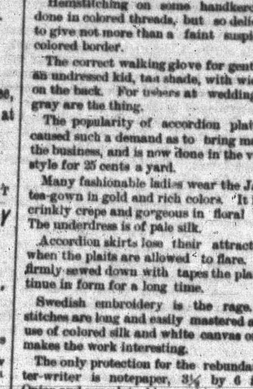
People who suffer from redness or inflammation of the nose should avoid the use of liquors and tobacco in every form, snuff, smelling salts and all pungent odors irritating to the nasal cavities.

The Summer zephyrs that play havoc with the broad-brimmed hat can be restricted by applying a butterfly bow of heavy velvet. This will weigh the light straw and defy the mischievous south wind.

Fashion has a new posy—the corn flower, better known as bachelor's button, or blueys. Mixed with sweet pea they make a lovely evening bouquet and worn alone they are first choice for morning toilets.

It looks as though the tight basque was losing its hold on fashion. In the lining the darts and seams are severely placed as ever, but under the bias effects the artist's folds and sculptor's drapery the identity of the position is almost lost.

White canvas shoes with tips and straps of white kid are being worn with Summer gowns. They are usually low, are laced on the instep and have half-high heels, although some of them are high and are laced up the ankles.



NEW YORK EVENING GOWN.

If your baby has cherry cheeks get her a yellow bonnet; if the lilies bloom in her face select a rose tint to fan them away. The small, sallow face may be relieved by a brown braid or brown muslin hat, brightened with a cluster of field flowers.

Figured gowns of silk, poplin, alpaca and cashmere for evening wear are very pretty made with a perfectly plain skirt and a draped short basque. With some soft plain silk of a contrasting tint make a shell ruching and finish the hem, cuffs and shoulders.

An effort will be made to introduce colors in the saddle at the Summer resorts. There is talk of white, gray, old-rose and almond brown habits with jockey caps to match, but the dark blue, invisible green and dead black are being made to order in the ladies' tailor shops.

Lace is gradually creeping into favor again and the new black piece goods show large patterns that are raised by an outline of cord, ribbon or kismet. This cloudy stuff is in demand for collars, jackets and shoulder pieces, girdles, hem facings and the whole list of mantles generally known as sling shoulders.

By all odds the sweetest thing in millinery is a fancy Milan braid, trimmed with gold ribbon bows and clusters of real ripe cherries. At the races, where the amenities are not always rigidly enforced, it is not unusual for the cavalier attendants to gobble up the tempting ox-hearts.

External applications are rarely beneficial. Frequent foot baths in hot water will never fail to lessen the quantity of blood in and about the head, and it is also a good plan to exercise the muscles by systematic breathing through the nose, taking in and exhaling the air in quick succession.

Grover Cleveland and Mrs. Cleveland have gone to their summer home on Buzzard's bay. They have taken a cottage near that of Mr. Gilder, the editor of the Century, and Mr. Cleveland expects the summer in seeking rest. There pretty good fishing in that vicinity, and there are none of the annoyances of flies which have caused Mr. Cleveland to renounce the Adirondacks.

When baby was sick, we gave her Castoria,
When she was a child, she cried for Castoria,
When she became Miss, she clung to Castoria.
When she had children, she gave them Castoria.
