One could almost say that man is one the worst enemies of the potate, if we may judge from the manner in Which he sometimes neglects one of his best of vegetable friends. While it requires a warm, rich soil, he gives it a water-soaked clay bed, as encouragement is given them to struggle against the weeds that threaten to choke out the last spark of life.

Many insects prey upon the narcotic berbage of the potato, the most destructive of well under subjection by a fully understood plan of applying London purple or Paris the methods of overcoming the blights an rots, the worst of which is the so-called wet rot. This is due to the growth of a low form of vegetation closely related to the mildew of the grape.
