Just at daylight Koch ascended the steps to the elevated railway station there, passed through the gate and to the south end of the platform, and took his stam just below and about a dozen feet from the window at which a white robed figure soon appeared. He then drew a pistol, put it to his temple and fired. The aim was true-he fell dead. Almost at the same instant a pistol sounded in the room above, and when the landlady entered it she found Emilie lying on her back on the bed, her night robe slightly opened in front, a small hole in her breast, and the pistol lying on the floor. The ball had gone straight through the beart and lodged just under the skin of the back. The pistols were of the same make, and had been bought by Koch the previous day. When he walked home with ! Emilie in the evening he carried them in a paper candy box, and at a friend's, where they remained a while, they spoke of the contents as "those precious candies." The funerals of the two suicides took place at the same time. Their bodies were reduced to ashes in a crematory on Long Island. A large, riotons and indecently
