SATURDAY EVEN'G, APRIL 24, 1875 TO MY PIPE.

Oh, browned in many assuring clime, And seathed in many a strange mishap, Still soft ascends thy circling smoke Before my after-dinner nap.

That passed like it, in smoke away,

And left, like thee, about my heart

Thou little world of fire and smoke,

And ashes of the happy past

Each puff recals a fleeting joy

But ashes of the blissful day. Each spark recalls a glistening eye That dimmed, like it, with Time's swift flig A falling star that sped, like thee, Though dreary shadows of the night.

now and then, and found its way silently up the chimney. The fire itself was low, for the spring time had come, and on little warmth was needed to keep off the damp of the night air, and the chill that came up from the woods close by the house where we were staying. The day had gone down an hour or so ago, and the twilight had deepened into darkness In that quie time we went back to other days, we wil not say how many, and out of the fire arose pictures that the busy routine of every-day life had faded, as the light dims the colors in the paintings of some master. We were sitting again before fire, not alone in a great old-fashioned arm chair, but nestled in the arms of a gray haired, stalwart man, whose shoulders the even bent. We heard a voice, deep sonorcus, read from the family Bible the verse commencing, 'The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want," and the memory of it was as fresh as if of yesterday. We saw faces pass before us with the kind smile upon them that, to us at least, they

I feel the cheer Of hands upon my shoulder, and know that they are near. Out of the fire and embers, came the memories of boyish freaks and escapades, and the punishment they entailed, of schoolboy days. Ah! weary man of the world, tell us if you would not give onehalf the gold that you have bartered body and soul to gain to tread once more the streets that lead to the golden-gate of boyhood? You may push back the gray locks from your forehead, but the breath of heaven does not blow as gently upon it as it did two score of years ago. It will wipe out no wrinkles from it, though it blow till doomsday. You may fold your hands over your heart, but you canno ever so hardly. TREASURE. -- Some curious autographs have been "unearthed" from a collection made by Count Enzenberg, for merly Resident of Hesse, at Paris. There is one signed by M. Guizot, which, it appears, runs to this effect :- "In the course of my long life I have learned two wise things : one is to forgive much; the other is never to forget." Underneath this M. Thiers has written :- "A little of forgetfulness does not injure the sincerity of the forgiveness;" and Prince Bismarck aubjoins to the two sentences the following :- "I have learned in my life to forget much, and to make myself much for-

Nor Propiriated. - Shortly before the late Emperor of China's death, a gigantic image, the Goddess of small-pox, was paraded round the City of Pekin in solemn procession, and then taken into the very bedroom of the dying youth, when it was worshipped and honored with many propitiatory offerings. As, however, the Goddess continued obdurate, she was subjected to a severe thrashing and other insults, and finally burned. The fatal result of the attack was, we suppose, her revenge for the maltreatment.
