We need not ask if that -a further step than the "Nation" proposeskilled off Partyism, for everyone knows that it did not. Free men will always think for themselves; they wil differ among themselves; there will be always those who will fail to agree with the most perfectly constructed Government; they will combine in their opposition; some one will lead them; they will thus become a Party, and their organization will survive the immediate cause of it, being kept up either by confidence in its leader, or devotion to its underlying principles. It is idle to butt against this fact, as certain a fact as human nature itself. It is idle to dream of compassing perfection.
