NAPOLEON'S ONE JOKE.

The Saturnine Emperor Cracked Smile Over His Own Wit.

Roland Belfort, writing about the third Napoleon in Mainly About People, tells the story of what was probably the only joke perpetrated by that monarch after he had ascended the throne. In the early days of the third empire the chief of the Paris omnibus service was Baron X., a tall, handsome, dashing fellow who was wonderfully fond of borses, driving, etc. Having once taken it into his head to drive a mail coach, drawn by six spank. ing horses, through the Rue Royale and along the Champs Elysees, he was discreetly notified that the emperor alone was entitled to indulge in the truly imperial luxury of a six horse equipage. "Very good," said the baron. "I will the discolored eye.-Chicago News. make other arrangements."

He kept his word. Shortly afterward the Parisians were astounded to see the baron gayly tooling along the Champs Elysees on the identical mail coach, drawn by four very small horses and two very large donkeys.
