where on the west of Greenland," said Capt. Robert Smith. "There is nothing surprising in Peary's long trip, or Bryan. and the fact that there was no news from the northern settlements up to the time we left is not to be wondered at. Peary starts from one point and makes for the next, leaving track behind him to help on his return. Besides this, there is abundance of food, and then by this time he is well known to the Esquimaux, who would look after him if occasion required. According to my way of thinking, when the Windward, with Mrs. Péary on board, reached there last August, they delayed too long and got caught fast.

In order to retain a piece of ground left to the parish in the good old days the viMagers have to include in the doubtful pleasure of a game of bottle kicking. But before they can begin to play certain preliminaries have to be gone through. Two large meat pies and two dozen penny lonves have to be scrambled for. A huge wooden bottle, bound round with iron rims and containing ale, is thrown on the ground, and the men of the neighboring village of Medbourne have to wrest it from the Hallatonian grasp. It is hardly necessary to add that the struggle is invariably provocative of a good many casualties of one form or another. When the battle has been won, the victors drink the contents of the bottle.-London Chronicle.
