The Daily Mail's correspondent at Rensberg, in a despatch, confirming the succes of Gen French, says that the British artillery opened the battle. The Boers were somewhat taken by surprise, but replied vigorously. The artiflery combat lasted for two hours. The British gunners wer remarkably accurate in their fire. The enemy's Hotchkiss gun first collapsed, and then their big gun was silence but the others did not cease firing un the Boers gradually fell back. The Hotchkies gun was abandoned and the British ceptured it, but the others were withdrawn to the north, shelling the British cavalry without damage. The advancing guns the British speedily silenced them. Many waggone were captured from the enemy altogether with a considerable quantity stores. The British losses were quite
