True Ideals. It was always aspiration rather than ambition by which I felt myself stirred. I did not care to outstrip others and become what is called "distinguished," were that a possibility, so much as I longed to answer the voice that invited, ever receding, up to invisible heights, however unattainable they might seem. I was conscious of a desire that others should feel something coming to them out of my life like the breath of flowers, the whisper of the winds, the warmth of the sunshine and the depth of the sky. That, I felt, did not require great gifts or a fine education. We might all be that to each other. And there was no opportunity to vanity or pride in receiving a beautiful The
