ALFRED OF WINCHESTER.

Mayor of the Modern City to Honor the Memory of the Great King.

If in October, 1901, England is not busily engaged in a war, the thousandth anniversary of the death of Alfred the Great will be fittingly celebrated. If this comes to pass, as already arranged, the city of Winchester, the capital of Alfred's little kingdom and the place where he passed the most of his life, will be the center of

A movement with this object in view has already been set on foot in Winchester and has received the cordial support of the warmly taken up by the mayor, Mr. Bowker, and it may perhaps be regarded as a good augury that, though his predecessors Miss J. Lovick, Ottawa, is at home for | in the mayoral dignity number 718, he himself is the first who has ever borne the honored name of Alfred.

The first years of Alfred's reign were years of storm and stress, years when he saw his kingdom desolated by the ruthless armies of the Danes, years of a desperate struggle for independence, in which,

There, ing himself to the advancement and improvement of his people.

Winchester can proudly claim to be the birthplace of English literature, as Alfred was its founder. It was for the people that Alfred wrote, and it was the language of the people that he used, and it is to him that we owe that unique possession, the English chronicle, the history of the race from the earliest times. The early part of the chronicle was probably compiled by the king, with the help of the brethren of St. Swithun, and copies were sent to the monks at Christchurch, Canterbury and to the Scriptorium at Peterborough, and there the record was continued, handing down the English language through the troubled times of the Norman conquest, till 1154, when it closes abruptly in the middle of a sentence.

And in his royal city the great king was buried, but the exact spot is undiscoverable. The tomb was moved under Ed. ward the Elder from the old minster to out this trade mark. the new, because the canons complained that his ghost "walked" and gave them
