STORIES OF MOMMSEN.

The Queer Doings of the Absentminded German Scholar and Politician.

Many of the stories about the extreme absentmindedness of some unnamed German professor had their origin in tales actually told-perhaps with not much care in verification-of Professor Theodor Monmsen of Berlin, a great German historical scholar and liberal politician.

Although the herr professor recently passed his eightieth birthday, he is said to be still in the height of his productiveness, active and energetic, a writer, a teacher and a causeur. He adopts the axiom of Goethe-which is not popular with most old men-"When a man is old, he must do more than when he is young." '

He is certainly no more absentminded in his old age than he was when he was younger. He has a family of ben living children and several grandchildren, and has always been fond of them all and not averse to taking care of them, but woe to any infant of whom he might lauve charge if his mind became seized by scholarly preoccupations! It is related that when his first child was a baby it was in his charge one day in his study. Wishing to make some inquiry from his library, he deposited the baby in the waste basket and forgot all about it; but presently the buby began to cry loudly. At last the sound disturbed orion theabsentminded student, whose thoughts were, and remained, on his study. Conscious only of a loud noise, he seized a quantity of loose papers and carefully covered the child with them, to muffle the sound! On another occasion, so the story goes, Professor Mommsen was going in a street car from Berlin to Charlottenburg, taking with him his little son. By and by the boy began to wriggle about and make a great deal of noise. By this tine his father was meditating profoundly. The boy's gacket soon disturbed his meditations. It seemed to the professor that it must be an extremely ill bred child that would make a disturbance in a public place. He would see if he could not quiet him, but first he would find out who he was.

"Little boy," he said sharply, "what is your name?" Naturally the small boy thought it strange to be asked his name by his own father, but he responded politely, "The same as yours, sir." "The same as mine!" The professor's attention was now aroused by this appeal to his ego, and the spell was broken. Ho took up his progeny, to the tremendous amusement of the people in the car, and gave him a good shaking .- Youth's Com-
