FEELING IN ENGLAND. The Saturday Review, the last issue to hand, removes the impression that all England is applauding the work of the Americans in their war against the Spaniards. The early capture of prizes, before the time fixed for the beginning of hostiliies, is described as an outrage upon the must elementary principles of justice; the dibustering of the same Americans is referred as "heroic folly," the language

"Whatever may be thought at present in Washington," says the Saturday Review, "in England we have not forgotten what happened during the Venezuela affair, nor more recently the conduct of the United States with regard to the Behring stal fishery question. The sudden effusion of friendliness towards England during the past fortnight, so far from being grateful to us, fills us rather with a sense of indecent humbug, whilst the action of the senate last week in promptly voting the half million dollars due to Great Britain under the Bebring Sea award, which ought . have been paid long ago, savours strongly the most unfortunate for Spain. With a States and re-enter, the army. accustomed to gain support by bribes. Whatever hysterical hypocrisy may de clare, there is no real friendliness as yet in England towards the Union." This is very plain talk, and it is justified by experience. The swing of congress on the Bebring Sea business is without a parallel, and its meaning is very clear. But Great Britain is the independent power whose inclination to see fair play is keeping the other European powers out of the war, and giving the Americans a chance to cover themselves with glory.
