Only those who were armed joined the in. surrectionary party, but many who remained at home aided the rebels with food and clothing. Capt. Gen. Compos, who first directed military operations, said these country people were rebels and spice, all of them, and that be could not succeed while these conditions remained. Weyler, therefore, conceived the idea of lodging and confining the country people in the towns, "destroying their habitations and their crope, and confiscating their stocks." Many of these ruralists, seeing that they must either fight or become prisoners, joined the insurgent party. They became what is called the impedimenta, the camp followers, armed mostly with machetes, and so useless in fighting, though most useful in foraging for the army, in herding, in raising crops and in general service.
