HUMANITY IN WAR. An incident at Hampstead has given oc casion for a great deal of criticism. Col. Fred. Grant, the colonel of a regiment, was asked by a man for leave to see his mother who was dying. He was accompanied by his sister, who joined her entreaties with those of her brother. Col. Grant was obdurate. He could not be moved. His sternness could have been reconciled had the regiment been organized and ready to go to the front. But it was not. It was one of the volunteer corps called into service by the emergencies of war. The man could have been given the leave he asked for, but he was refused. He gave offence quences, he would go, at which Col. Grant had him stripped of his uniform and reof disgrace. Col. Grant's action is endorsed on the ground that in time of necessity, when in the service of the country and in war, the soldier knows no feeling save that arising from devotion to duty. The New York Sun, referring to the case, says that in many cases, perhaps in hundreds of thousands, the men at the front lost the nearest and dearest of friends while they had to stay with the columns. during war, the fact remains that Col. Grant was unnecessarily severe. The News heartily endorses the sentiment of the Brockville Times: "The doctors of Ontario are a credit and their ability is recognized, particularly in the United States, where an Ontario medical degree is as strong a recommendation as may be The American who wanted to look into a readiness with which some of Gotham's obtained."
