He is empowered to enquire into all the financial transactions of the government, to see that all payments are regularly made, to object to any he may not be eatiefied with, to give rulinge against them, and have them referred, if need be, to the treasury board.

His experience has been the same under concervative and liberal rule. While the conservatives ruled Mr. McDougall had his collisions with officials and ministers. and he gave decisions which the treasury board had no hesitation in setting aside. Mr. Foster was a member of the treasury board, and while he acted he was not so anxious that the auditor-general should have more latitude in his criticism and greater liberty in incurring printing expensee. But he is in opposition now, and he is posing as a political reformer. sham and hypocrisy he is a master.

Sir Richard Cartwright took the only position that could be reasonably assumed upon this question. He said that if the act under which Mr. McDougall served was not what it should be it was open to amendment, but that motions of the Foster-Tupper kind were plainly out of order. This motion was defeated, we are told, "by a strict party vote," which is another way of eaying that the liberals want the auditor. general to do his work according to law, and in that way only.
